PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 99th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE—Wednesday, March 12, 1986

(Legislative day of Monday, March 10, 1986)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The opening prayer for the Senate today will be given by the Reverend William A. Alexander, Sr., minister of the St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, of Nashville, TN. He is sponsored by Senator ALBERT GORE.

PRAYER

The Reverend William A. Alexander, Sr., minister, St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Nashville, TN, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Almighty God, we beseech Thee to look with favor upon our land and people. All undeserving, Thou hast made us great among the nations of the Earth. Let us not forget that this place and this power have come of Thee, and that we need divine inspiration and a divine trust to use in Thy service.

Gracious Father, grant to the Members and the officers of this august body a sacred moment of quiet ere they take up the duties of the day. May all their legislation be such as will promote not just the welfare of our country, but to be resolute in purpose to advance good will and peace among all men.

Heavenly Father, let them not think, when this prayer is said, that their dependence upon Thee is over, and forget Thy counsels for the rest of the day. Prayer at its best is revealed when a man enjoys God and prays out of sheer love of Him.

Eternal God, lest we forget the words of the prophet who said, "He hath showed Thee O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of Thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with Thy God?" Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The able majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me first yield to my distinguished colleague from Tennessee, Senator GORE.

TRIBUTE TO THE REVEREND WILLIAM A. ALEXANDER, SR.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding.

Rev. William A. Alexander is pastor of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church in Nashville. He is a graduate of Fisk, and a World War II veteran. He and his wife, Faye, have three sons and a daughter, including a son making a career in the Air Force, a doctor, and two students.

In December, he will have served as pastor of St. Andrew's for 35 years.

Thousands in Nashville have found inspiration in his words, and now, through this morning's inaugural radio broadcast of the Senate, millions have the opportunity to share Reverend Alexander's prayer.

It is an honor to be able to introduce him to the Senate. We appreciate the prayer that he has delivered this morning.

Mr. DOLE. I thank my colleague from Tennessee.

Let me yield briefly to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi who has an announcement to make of some importance to thousands of us in rural areas.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I am happy to be able to announce that the conferees have agreed this morning on an urgent supplemental appropriations bill making available $5 billion to the Commodity Credit Corporation.

The Senate will recall that there has been some limiting language added by the House to this bill.

We were able to work out the differences by providing that the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation will continue to have borrowing authority from the Commodity Credit Corporation to pay claims for those insured under that program.

Also, the Conservation Reserve Program will continue to have access to the Commodity Credit Corporation funds for the first 2 years of the operation of the Conservation Reserve Program.

We also added language that clearly indicates the intent of the conferees that the appropriated levels of funds for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration be made available until expended but subject to the sequester order of March 1, 1986.

I am happy to make that announcement, and I appreciate very much the majority leader yielding for that purpose.

Mr. DOLE. I thank my distinguished colleague from Mississippi, Senator COCHRAN.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each, followed by special orders in favor of Senators THURMOND, PROXMIRE—and I ask unanimous consent that Senator DENTON's time be transferred to Senator ARMSTRONG.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Senators ARMSTRONG, FORD, TRIBLE, PRYOR, and CRANSTON, not to exceed 5 minutes each, and then routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 11 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

Following routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 225, the constitutional amendment calling for a balanced budget.

I would again alert my colleagues we will have rollcall votes today. This could be a very late evening, hopefully not, but we would like to complete action on the balanced budget amendment. We would like to take up, following the balanced budget amendment today, the committee funding resolutions. We understand they must be done this week, and the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, Senator MATHIAS, will not be available after today. So we need to act on those.

I hope we can resolve any problems rather quickly, and then tomorrow we will consider either the water bill or the regional airport legislation. There will likely be a session and votes on Friday.

RADIO/TELEVISION TEST PERIOD BEGINS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as has already been noted by some, today marks the beginning of a new era in the U.S. Senate.

Today the American people can tune-in to their democracy. As the Senate majority leader, I am pleased to announce that this is the beginning of an historic test period for radio and television in this Chamber. During the next 126 days, the people will be able to hear for themselves—without traveling to their Capitol—what's going on in Washington. Thanks to radio, you, the people * * * on the Great Plains of Kansas; in our cities and on our farms; and up and down Main Street America; you are now listening to the sounds of the Senate.

Because of technical considerations, radio goes first; but television is just around the corner. Actually, after viewing us on television, the people may demand that we stick with radio! In fact, radio and politics have come a long way together. History tells us that the first radio show broadcast the results of the Harding-Cox Presidential election returns of 1920. But while radio moved forward into the satellite era, the Senate stayed behind in the days of the crystal set. Despite the fact that there are a half billion radios in the United States, not one of them yesterday could pick up the Senate proceedings.

I want to salute the many champions of the legislation that helped open this institution to the microphone and the camera.

My predecessor, Howard Baker, of Tennessee, was a tireless advocate of radio and television coverage of the Senate proceedings, as was Senator MATHIAS, the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee; Senator WENDELL FORD, the ranking Democratic member; Senator BILL ARMSTRONG; Senator ALBERT GORE; and many, many others who have been in the forefront; Senator TED STEVENS; and certainly my good friend and distinguished minority leader has been in the forefront of this advance.

There are many others, Mr. President, who deserve credit on both sides of the aisle, but the important point in this is a bipartisan effort. The results were bipartisan. I hope that the impact will be bipartisan across the country.

We have had radio before. We have had special coverage of the Panama Canal treaties in 1978.

But for too long, the Senate has been off limits to modern technology. That is why, starting today, the American public will have its ear to this Chamber; later its eyes, when television plugs in on June 1. For the first time, our proceedings will be heard by the people unedited: All the debates, the filibusters, the rollcall votes and, of course, all the bleeps, bloops and blunders, and the delays. One thing I would hope that could come from live radio and TV coverage would be more orderly procedures, more discipline, and less wasted time. I hope the American people demand that of those of us who are honored to serve in the U.S. Senate.

This test will run until July 15, after which time Senators will take 2 weeks to evaluate the grand experiment. We may decide to pull the plug; or continue the test; or make radio and television coverage permanent. You the listener will help us make that decision and we look forward to hearing from you.

Many of us hoped that the arrival of broadcasting would also bring with it some much-needed rules changes—changes that would make this body more efficient. If radio and TV coverage help us reach that goal, so much the better. Yes, some modest rules changes have been enacted for this test period, but true to the ground rules of this institution, we are still wide open to debate. We are not the House of Representatives, as you will see and hear. Millions of television viewers have been watching the House for years and have come to understand some of the nuts and bolts of congressional procedure.

But let me explain that the Senate is a whole different ballgame, and you cannot superimpose the two Houses—it is apples and oranges: we are the apples, they are the oranges. [Laughter.] We are different from the House with regards to the rules of debate. In the House, its Rules Committee can strictly limit debate on a measure. No such committee prevents Members on this side from speaking at length or offering a great many amendments. There are rules and procedures here that most likely will baffle, confuse and frustrate our radio and TV audience. Believe me, they will have my sympathy. Nevertheless, these very rules of the game make the Senate a unique and important voice in the system of checks and balances that are the foundation of our Government. These special rules protect the rights of the minority and allow one man or one woman to make a difference. This is the essence of our democracy.

Today there is much work to be done, and we could be as I have indicated earlier, in session late, late this evening. Before us is a very important issue—whether our Constitution should require the Federal budget to be in balance each and every year. I believe it must. I look forward to sharing this debate today with you, the American people. Above all, I welcome you to this historic moment in the U.S. Senate.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, Talleyrand dominated the politics of Europe for 40 years. It was he who said, "There is more wisdom in public opinion than is to be found in Napoleon, Voltaire, or all the Ministers of State, present and to come.

It is that belief in the wisdom of public opinion that has motivated many of us, if not most of us, to support television and radio coverage of the Senate debates.

Today is an important and proud day in the history of the U.S. Senate, and in the history of broadcasting. Today marks the first time that the proceedings of the U.S. Senate will be broadcast on a regular basis. This is a day, I am sure, which will be forever included as one of the historic dates in the history of broadcasting.

The broadcasting of the 1920 returns in the Presidential election between Warren G. Harding and James Cox by KDKA in Pittsburgh sparked what the former Chief of Motion Pictures, Broadcasting, and Recorded Sound of the Library of Congress, Erik Barnouw, described as the "national mania."

Following that election broadcasting, the Commerce Department was deluged with applications for broadcast licenses. The beginning of radio's increasing involvement in America's political life, then, has not been too long ago.

In 1923, the opening of Congress and President Calvin Coolidge's State of the Union Message were broadcast over radio from the House Chamber.

On March 3, 1929, came the first radio broadcast from the Senate Chamber when retiring Vice President Dawes and incoming Vice President Charles Curtis both spoke. The next year, 1930, witnessed yet even another important step in the history of radio: The first coast-to-coast network hookup was established. I am pleased to point out that it was a Member of this Chamber, Senator William Borah, of Idaho, who made the first address across the entire Nation.

During the Panama Canal debates, the Senate broadcast the coverage of those debates by radio. It was on February 8, 1978, that the American people, for the first time, became directly involved in the floor proceedings of the U.S. Senate. As the then-majority leader of the U.S. Senate, I worked for such coverage and the then-minority leader, Senator Howard Baker, worked with me and other Senators in making the radio broadcast of those debates possible.

National Public Radio found that its audience increased fivehold in Washington, DC, New York, and Los Angeles, cities in which ratings were measured, and the broadcast of those proceedings constituted an informative as well as an interesting service to the American people. It brought them better and more accurate information regarding the basis on which Senators voted for or against the treaty. It cleared away some of the distorted debris of misinformation and propaganda that were being espoused by some who opposed the treaty.

Because of the decision to broadcast Senate proceedings on a regular basis, a policy that begins today, I am confident that a better and more fully informed public opinion will result. And it is an informed public opinion that substantiates and supports democracy, and on which our representative democracy depends and thrives.

On this day, the people's right to a full and unvarnished truth has taken a rather important step. The benefits will accrue to all because an informed public opinion is not merely healthy, it is also essential for the democratic process to work effectively.

I fully expect that American history will record this as another of the red-letter dates in the annals of broadcasting and in the annals of democracy. I am proud—and I share that pride with 99 other Members of this body—to have witnessed this day as a Member of the Senate. I am also proud to have played a part in hastening the arrival of this day. I commend all other Senators, both current and former, who worked to see what is happening today become a reality.

Mr. President, I yield the balance of my time to Senator ALBERT GORE, a Senator who has worked hard and long and very effectively in making this day of radio coverage of Senate debates possible.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I appreciate the distinguished minority leader yielding. As he has said, this is a historic day for the U.S. Senate, the first regular session of the Senate to be carried on a live radio broadcast. Like the House of Representatives, we shall begin with radio and then move on to television. The executive branch followed a similar evolution in its relationship with the electronic media.

Technically, this is a test period, but we all expect that the test will be successful and that today will mark the beginning of continuous electronic broadcast coverage of Senate sessions.

When the American people can hear for themselves what takes place here on the floor of the Senate, they will realize how well we have listened to them all along. Putting free debate on the air will reinvigorate representative democracy and self-government and help the Senate restore its place as the premier deliberative body in the world.

Many have mentioned those who have made this day possible, but I would like to pay particular tribute to the minority leader, Senator ROBERT BYRD. Others have tried hard to open the Senate to broadcast coverage. This session, for the first time, Senator BYRD led the fight. It is no coincidence that this time we won.

I would like to also commend the majority leader, Senator DOLE, who provided outstanding leadership in assisting the Senate to take this step. Senator MATHIAS and Senator FORD on the Rules Committee have given us leadership and shared with us their wisdom. I would like to also single out Senator ARMSTRONG, who has been an invaluable ally in pushing this forward. It certainly would not have happened without his leadership and support.

Like the majority leader, I, too, would like to pay tribute to my predecessor, a Senator from Tennessee, Senator Howard Baker. He fought long and hard to open up this institution to broadcast coverage, and the night we voted to do so, I called him to make sure he would be the first outside this Chamber to know. As my colleagues might expect, he was just as pleased as I am that we had made such a historic decision. I thank the minority leader yielding on this occasion, and I again congratulate all those who have made this day possible.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. I think I have 51 seconds remaining of my leader's time. I would like to yield that to the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, Senator MATHIAS.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader. This has been a longer struggle than most people realize. It began in 1924. That makes it extremely significant that the majority leader, Senator DOLE, the minority leader, Senator BYRD, Senator ARMSTRONG, Senator STEVENS, Senator GORE, and many others have joined together to bring us to this day. It is a historic day.

It marks the culmination of efforts that began 62 years ago, when radio coverage of the Senate was first conceived, because it was in 1924 that far-sighted Senators first explored the possibility of providing radio coverage of Senate proceedings. The Senators asked the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to investigate and report to the Senate about the feasibility of broadcasting from the Senate floor. Unfortunately, that was not technologically possible, but today it has become possible.

Three years later the U.S. military reported back that they had no apparatus that could be used that was worthy of mention. The committee found that "the greater part" of the country would best be covered by the installation of 23 stations, but that the stations would be too far apart to allow a sufficiently strong signal to be received at the next station. So much for the pioneering days of radio in the Senate.

Today, the technological barriers that stymied our predecessors have vanished. It was a simple matter to install the equipment that makes possible live radio broadcasting of Senate proceedings. With a flip of a switch, we are on the air, and the American people can hear their Senators at work. In 6 weeks, when the TV test period begins, the people will be able to see us at work as well. The steps we take today are long overdue, but I hope we will all conclude that they are well worth taking, and that radio and TV coverage of the Senate will be made permanent.

Mr. President, as we prepare for the test period of televising proceedings of the U.S. Senate, we would do well to reflect on the wise advice offered by James Reston in the New York Times on March 2, 1986.

Mr. Reston said that televising Senate proceedings offers an excellent opportunity for Senators. Instead of preening and grandstanding before the cameras, as critics of television insist they will, they could set aside specific periods of time to debate the great issues facing the world, and use television "for the education of their constituents." Mr. Reston suggested that under such an arrangement, even young people might be persuaded to watch the Senate seriously debate an issue and then continue the discussion among themselves afterward.

Mr. President, two of the Senate's distinguished former members, Senators James Pearson of Kansas and Abraham Ribicoff of Connecticut offered the same suggestions in a report on Senate practices and procedures issued in April 1983. I hope the Members of the Senate will act on these fine suggestions from Mr. Reston and from within the Senate itself, and allow the country and the world to watch this great deliberative body tackle the controversial issues of our time. We would all benefit from such debate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Mr. Reston be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TV IN THE SENATE

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON.—The Senate of the United States has decided to experiment with televising its proceedings. This could help restore the great debating tradition of the United States or it could bring back vaudeville. It all depends on the rules.

It's easy to understand why the Senate reached this decision after fiddling and fudging it for years. Ronald Reagan hasn't convinced the senators that his policy is right, but he has convinced them that his personality and his television techniques are dominating public opinion, and that they have to do something about it.

Besides, the House of Representatives, without many people's noticing, has been televising its arguments for some time, and the Senate, proud of its reputation as the "greatest deliberative body in the world," has always felt that what the House does, the Senate can do better.

The case for televising debates here in Washington on the decisions that affect the lives of the American people is that the voters should, at least once in a while, have a glimpse about how these decisions are made, not only in the Congress, but in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Warren Burger of Minnesota, Chief Justice of the United States, is fiercely opposed to this intrusion of television on the decision process, and has given clear warning that if the day ever comes when the television cameras come into his Court, that will be the day he'll resign.

But there's a difference between the Court and the Congress; and an argument could be made that for the Congess, television is not a problem but an opportunity, as we saw in the racial struggles of the South many years ago, in the Vietnam War and most recently in the crisis of the Philippines, when the cameras brought the struggles into our living rooms and made us think.

There are, as we all know, troubling problems among the nations on the control of weapons on earth and in outer space, and about the distribution of money for weapons or for the education of our children, or about the bankruptcy of our farmers.

The decision of the Senate to bring the cameras into its chamber suggests at least the possibility that television could be used to help national understanding of those problems and not merely for political interests.

We are living in a revolutionary age of propaganda at home and abroad. For the first time we have a world economy, with the industrial nations competing for trade and profit; the superpowers argue over nuclear weapons, and the majority of the human race lives in hunger and hears by modern communications that their misery is not inevitable but intolerable.

So much depends on how the United States handles all these tangles, how our people see the coming world in which their children will have to live. Television, which too often gives us the world of illusion, has also recently shown us in the Philippines a vision of reality.

In the Senate it could go either way. The proceedings could be televised, each member could take his clips, and after careful editing in the television studios in the basement of the Senate office buildings, send them back to TV stations in their states to demonstrate what fine senators they are and how necessary is their relection.

On the other hand, the Senate could, without altering many rules, set aside, say once a month, an hour's time to debate the major questions for decision.

Even the commerical networks wouldn't be able to ignore such a surprising meeting of the Senate, with all members present, so that the people, almost for the first time, would be able to judge for themselves the struggle over public issues.

It could even be that young people in the universities, who for some reason would rather demonstrate than debate, would watch the Senate in serious discussion and carry it on among themselves later on.

Most senators have got the main point: that politically, they're probably going to live or die by television; but there's just a chance now that they can use it not only for themselves or their parties, but for the education of their constitutents, and particularly for the respect of the young, whose enthusiasm for politicians and the media, and even the democratic process, is not excessive these days.

But it will all depend on the rules on television in the Senate. The senators can use television for their own purposes or for the purpose of bringing the nation together. We will just have to wait and see what sort of rules they can agree upon.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, do I have any time remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Democratic leader has 1 minute and 40 seconds.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

I yield that time to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Mr. FORD, who is the ranking member on the Rules Committee, and who has worked hard to make this day possible.

Mr. FORD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader for allowing me to take his time this morning to make a few remarks. They will be brief.

Mr. President, I rise today in celebration of the marriage of technology to the principles of democratic government. When the Senate first convened almost 200 years ago, its deliberations were closed to the public. In response to the objections of President Washington and several Senators, the Senate galleries were opened to the public after an extended debate.

At that time, however, radio did not exist; although every American had the right to listen to the debates of the Senate, it was necessary to travel to Washington in order to do so. And so it remained, with the exception of the Panama Canal treaties debate, until today. As of this morning, the Senate is making available to any broadcaster who wants to carry it, radio coverage of the floor proceedings of the U.S. Senate. I am hopeful that many broadcasters will choose to make such programming available to their listeners, and am confident that broadcast coverage of the Senate will become a permanent feature of American politics.

Mr. President, this is a proud day for the U.S. Senate. This body of a free and open government "of the people" has finally taken advantage of one tool of the world's most advanced society in order to bring its people closer to the process of American government. I would venture to guess that there are many Americans who would want to listen to our debates, but who do not have the time or the money to come to Washington, DC. Now they can hear us—or shut us off—with the flip of a switch.

I would like to acknowledge the efforts of our two leaders in bringing the Senate into the 20th century. Without the determination of Senator BYRD and the patience of Senator DOLE, the opening of the Senate to the American people would not have been possible. I praise them for their efforts in bringing an open government closer to a free society.

In closing, let me compliment my distinguished colleague from Maryland, Senator MATHIAS. He is one of the major reasons that we are having radio today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. FORD. I thank the Chair.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR THURMOND

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

LIVE RADIO BROADCAST OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today marks an historic occasion indeed. For the first time since the 1977 debates on the Panama Canal treaties, the American public has access to the proceedings of the Senate Chamber via the medium of radio. I welcome this, Mr. President, and I say welcome to those who may be listening to these proceedings, especially those who may be hearing

Senate proceedings for the very first time.

I wish to commend the able majority leader, Senator DOLE, for the leadership he has shown in this matter and also for the former majority leader, Senator Howard Baker, for the lead he took in it also. I also wish to commend Senator MATHIAS and Senator STEVENS, Senator ARMSTRONG and others. On the Democratic side I wish to commend the able Democratic leader, Senator BYRD, and also Senator GORE and Senator FORD for the lead they have taken in this matter.

In my view, Mr. President, broadcast media coverage of Senate Chamber proceedings is both warranted and wise. The providing of such coverage is no more than a recognition of the basic right and need of the citizens of our Nation to know the business of their Government. It will, I believe, lead to a more informed citizenry, and thereby hopefully improve the quality of our representative democracy. The ability of the electorate to scrutinize the representation provided by their respective Senators will be greatly enhanced. In the long run, the quality of Senate debate and decisionmaking will be improved, and the country will be the better for it.

While it is a historic day, it is my sincere hope, Mr. President, that today will be recorded by history as but a milestone in the progression of events leading up to full, continuous access to Senate proceedings through live radio broadcasts as well as live television coverage. Upon expiration of this test period of radio and television coverage of Senate proceedings, the Senate should approve permanent broadcast coverage. The American public deserves no less.

OUR TRADE DEFICIT AND THE DECLINE OF THE DOLLAR

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, much attention has been given as of late to the recent declines in the value of the dollar relative to a select few other currencies. We keep hearing that the huge trade deficits we have been accumulating will be offset by these recent declines in the value of the dollar. I wish this were the case; but, unfortunately, it does not appear to be.

In January of this year, almost a year after the dollar peaked against the yen and several other major currencies, Mr. President, the U.S. merchandise trade deficit hit a new monthly record of $16.5 billion. During January, the United States imported goods, the value of which totaled almost twice the value of goods we exported. Figures such as that unfortunately demonstrate that the drop in the value of the dollar has not solved our trade problems. In fact, during the past 3 months, the trade deficit has run at an annual rate of about $180 billion, compared with the record $148.5 billion deficit for all of 1985.

Why has the declining dollar not improved our trade situation? An article in the March 2, 1986, edition of the Washington Post points out some of the reasons. According to the article, it could take up to 2 years for the dollar's decline to have a substantial impact on the flow of trade. In the meantime, plants continue to close and workers continue to lose their jobs.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the dollar has not fallen nearly so much as many might like to have us believe—at least not when compared with the currencies of some countries with which we have a very large, unfavorable balance of trade. For instance, the value of the dollar last week was, in real terms, higher relative to the currencies of Canada, Hong Kong, Taiwan, South Korea, Mexico, Brazil, Venezuela, and Australia than it was, on average, in 1984.

It is true that the dollar has declined in value somewhat against the Japanese yen and the German mark. This should help with respect to trade with those nations. However, insofar as those other countries I have mentioned are concerned, the dollar remains higher now than it was in 1984 and these are some of the countries from which we buy a great deal of goods. Our own domestic industries must compete with them both here and in foreign markets. The heralded "declining dollar" has not declined against them and we should not expect our trade situation with them to improve. Until such time as our dollar does decline in value against those currencies, the prospects for improving our trade situation with those nations appears bleak.

Mr. President, this is particularly bad news for our beleaguered textile and apparel industry. Three of the countries where the relative value of our dollar has risen are the largest shippers of textile and apparel products into the United States. Combined imports from Taiwan, South Korea, and Hong Kong account for over 35 percent of total American textile and apparel imports. I can only hope that this does not mean that an already terrible situation will get even worse.

For the 2 previous months for which figures are available—December and January—imports of textiles and apparel were up consecutively by more than 40 percent over the same months of 1 year ago. We had back-to-back monthly import increases of more than 40 percent. In the 5-month period spanning September 1985, through January 1986, we imported more textile and apparel products than in the entire year of 1980. More imports in 5 months, Mr. President, than for the entire year of 1980. This is indeed startling.

Mr. President, as import figures from the last few months indicate, the textile industry of our Nation is in deep trouble. It cannot survive if these import surges continue. As I have pointed out, the so-called decline of the dollar is not helping our textile manufacturers. Something must be done to preserve American jobs in this vital industry. I urge the administration to negotiate a tough, new multifiber arrangement. In addition, I urge my colleagues to stand ready to override the veto of the Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Act. If we do not act strongly and decisively, it will be too late for thousands of hard-working Americans.

Mr. President, so that my colleagues may have the benefit of the entire Post article which I mentioned earlier, I ask unanimous consent that it appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOLLAR'S DECLINE HAS NOT BRIGHTENED NATION'S FOREIGN TRADE PICTURE SO FAR

(By John M. Berry)

The sharp decline in the value of the U.S. dollar on foreign exchange markets has been almost a non-event as far as the nation's bleak trade picture is concerned.

Some U.S. companies trying to sell goods abroad, where the competition is Japanese, West German or French—against whose currencies the dollar has come down the most—are finding they again have something to talk about, according to analysts surveying the trade scene.

So far, however, there has been no surge of export orders, according to these analysts. And meanwhile, the pace of imports is expected to pick up as the result of an apparent pickup in economic growth.

One reason for the lack of response to date might be that the value of the dollar—adjusted for inflation differentials and according to the amount of trade between each country and the United States—now is about 2.5 percent below its 1984 average.

But the dollar, when measured this way, is well above its value for several years prior to 1984.

In January, nearly a year after the dollar peaked against the yen, deutsche mark and several other prominent currencies, the U.S. merchandise trade deficit hit a record $16.5 billion, the Commerce Department said last week.

With the cost of insurance and freight charges included in the value of imports, the United States imported almost twice as many goods as it exported.

Nor is the bad trade news a one-month blip. During the past three months, the merchandise trade deficit has run at an annual rate of about $180 billion, compared with the $148.5 billion deficit for all of 1985.

Economist Rimmer de Vries of Morgan Guaranty Trust Co. recently told the Joint Economic Committee that if there were no further depreciation of the dollar, the nation's merchandise trade balance would improve slowly.

It would decline to about $105 billion by 1988 but then start to rise again, he said. A substantial part of the improvement would be the result of lower oil prices, not the fall of the dollar to date.

C. Fred Bergsten of the Institute for International Economics is less optimistic than de Vries. Bergsten estimates the dollar's drop so far is only about enough to stabilize the non-oil trade deficit, not improve it.

Economists and government policymakers have warned all along that it could take up to two years for the dollar's decline to have a substantial impact on trade flows. In fact, in the short-run, the decline of a currency can make a trade deficit appear worse.

That phenomenon—called the "J-curve" effect—occurs because it will take more dollars to buy a given quantity of imported goods unless foreign producers lower their prices as calculated in terms of their own currencies.

Eventually, export markets are supposed to be stimulated because U.S. producers would be able to sell their goods more cheaply abroad than before, while importers would have to charge higher prices, in terms of dollars, when they sell in the United States. This shift in relative prices should encourage export sales and discourage purchases of imported goods, and thus improve the trade balance.

For all that to occur, two things have to happen. First, the value of the dollar must come down compared with the currencies of the countries with which the United States trades, or against whose products U.S. producers compete in so-called third-country markets—that is, in countries other than the United States or the home country of the competing producer.

Second, foreign producers have to set their prices so they reflect a significant portion of the change in exchange rates. If a foreign producer is willing to accept a much smaller profit margin on his sales, he might be able to absorb the impact of a cheaper dollar and hold onto his share of the market for his products.

There is strong evidence that neither of these two necessary changes have taken place.

For one thing, the value of the U.S. dollar has fallen far less than might be supposed from the daily news stories about its decline against the yen, the mark and a few other currencies. Compared with currencies of some countries important to U.S. trade, the dollar has fallen little, or, in some cases, it has even risen.

Meanwhile, the dollar prices of many imported goods are rising only modestly. At the end of 1985, a Labor Department index of imported goods prices stood lower than it had at the beginning of the year.

The index did go up 1.8 percent in the fourth quarter, but that only retraced part of the declines earlier in the year.

Furthermore, there has been little upward movement in the dollar cost of raw commodities traded in auction markets around the world, one of the first places most analysts had expected the dollar's decline to be felt.

How one measures the extent of the dollar's decline depends of several factors, including the point from which the change is measures.

Take the yen, for example. The dollar peaked against the yen in February 1985. As of last week, the dollar's value had dropped more than 30 percent compared with the Japanese currency.

However, many analysts regard the February peak as a sort of speculative bubble that had little impact on trade flows. Instead of the peak, they prefer to use as a base the average yen-dollar exchange rate over a longer period, often 1984. From that average, the dollar's value has fallen only about 24 percent.

And many analysts believe such comparisons are substantially improved if the exchange rates are adjusted for any differential in inflation between the countries involved. In this case, Japanese inflation has been running at about half the rate of inflation in the United States. Thus, the real yen-dollar exchange rate has come down about 20 percent compared with 1984 rather than 24 percent.

But Japan is not the most important country for U.S. trade. Canada has had that position for years, and 1985 accounted for more than 20 percent of U.S. trade—that is, imports and exports. Japan was not far behind with 16.5 percent.

The increase in the value of the yen eventually ought to lead to a reduction in the huge $49.7 billion trade deficit the United States had with that nation last year.

On the other hand, the 6.4 percent rise in the real value of the dollar since 1984 compared with the Canadian dollar also has important implications for trade.

The Canadian dollar is not a widely used international currency and its movements have not made the headlines. Nor has the fact that the U.S. dollar is up in real value by nearly 20 percent compared with the Mexican peso, the United States's third largest trading partner. (See table.)

The U.S. dollar's value also was higher in real terms last week than it was, on average, in 1984, when compared with the currencies of South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Brazil, Venezuela and Australia.

If the change in the dollar's value against each of the currencies of the 14 countries shown in the table—which together encompass nearly three-fourths of all U.S. trade—is averaged using the volume of bilateral trade as weights, the dollar has declined only about 2.5 percent from its 1984 average.

A different weighting process using various countries' share of total world trade—in which the German mark and the French franc, for instance, have much greater importance—shows a considerably greater decline in the value of the dollar.

An in-between sort of approach, that uses elements of bilateral and multilateral trade weights, shows a decline of about 10 percent since 1984, according to Bergsten of the Institute of International Economics.

Some relief on the trade front should be on the way soon as a result of plunging oil prices.

Many oil experts expect the cost of imported oil to be down by at least one-third from last year's average of about $27 for each 42-gallon barrel—and the price drop could be greater. With net imports of about 1.6 billion barrels, last year's net oil bill of about $43 billion could be lowered by $14 billion or more.

But the big drop in oil prices has little or nothing to do with what has happened to the value of the dollar.

Since oil is priced in dollars worldwide, a shift in the dollar's value can have a significant impact on the local cost of oil in, say, West Germany or Japan, but not in the United States.

The fastest route to improvement of the trade balance, in the opinion of a number of economists, would be faster economic growth in other industrial nations, particularly West Germany and Japan.

However, governments of both countries have resisted suggestions by the United States that their economies could be given a boost by lowering interest rates—though Japanese rates were reduced slightly a few weeks ago.

Meanwhile, significant reduction in the record trade deficits apparently will require a continued decline in the value of the dollar, however it is measured.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in closing, I want to say that actions must be taken to preserve our textile industry. Again, I want to repeat that the Defense Department has said that textiles rank second to steel in the matter of national defense.

Again I want to repeat that in the last 5 years we have lost 350,000 jobs in the textile and apparel industry. In my State alone, we have lost 25,000 jobs. Mills keep closing. People keep losing their jobs.

Mr. President, now is the time for action. We urge the administration, we plead with the administration, we beg the administration, to take some action to remedy this situation with regard to textiles and apparel. A new Multifiber Arrangement meeting is coming up. It is vital that strong action be taken to preserve these American jobs. It does not make sense to send jobs overseas when our people are out of work. I hope the administration will see this and take the proper action.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

RADIO BROADCAST OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in case anybody listening on the radio thinks that the Senate is always harmonious, I want to dispel that myth immediately. I think this is a very bad idea. I do not think we should ever broadcast our proceedings on the radio, certainly not gavel to gavel, and I do not think we should have television broadcasts.

As a matter of fact, the No. 1 victim of this is the rights of Senators. Already we have seen them abridged. This is the first time in about 15 years when we have not been able to get a special order for more than 5 minutes. That means that if you want to make a statement of any substance, you have to confine it to 5 minutes. That is one limitation that I think is serious.

It is unfortunate. It is something that should not happen.

I always thought when I came to the Senate it was one body where you could get up and speak at will as an elected Member. I find that is not true. We have had limitations on our rights throughout the years, and I suspect that once television gets going in this body that 5 minutes will be limited to 1 minute or 2 minutes.

The leaders still have 10 minutes. You can predict that. They have not shortened their time at all. But the rank and file Members get 5 minutes, and that is all. We are all equal except for a couple of leaders who are not equal.

We all used to have the opportunity to get up and speak when we wished at length when I first came to this body. Now it is down to 5 minutes and declining.

TOP COMPUTER EXPERTS SAY STAR WARS WON'T WORK

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, who opposes SDI or star wars? Answer: Those who have the most significant qualifications. Most impressively it comes from expert scientists who could gain rich monetary reward by selling out to star wars but refuse to do so. These are the people who have the expert competence to assess the practical prospects of SDI as an effective contribution to our national security. Consider David Parnas. He is one of the world's leading computer experts. He has been a longtime, highly valued contributor to weapons development for the Department of Defense. The DOD so esteemed his expertise that they paid him $1,000 a day as a consultant on star wars. Star wars posed an exciting as well as financially rewarding challenge for this top computer expert. Dr. Parnas is thoroughly familiar with the complexity of the challenge as well as the marvelous potential capability of computers—particularly when the Government is ready, willing and able to spend whatever billions of dollars it might require to provide a computer system that could make star wars succeed. But Dr. Parnas decided star wars cannot work. He has decided the SDI will be a multibillion dollar fiasco. He has proven the sincerity of his conviction in a way that deeply impresses this Senator. Parnas quit his thousand-dollar-a-day job as a consultant for the Defense Department on star wars because—said Parnas—the project will fail. It is a waste of money.

Last summer 52 members of the physics faculty at the University of Illinois and 70 doctoral students signed a statement labelling star wars, "technically dubious and politically unwise." These computer experts, made two devastating arguments against further Federal spending on SDI. They said first, "anti-ballistic missile defense of sufficient reliability to defend the population of the United States against a Soviet first strike is not technically feasible in the foreseeable future." Then they added the second argument, the real crusher. "A system of more limited capability will only serve to escalate the arms race by encouraging the development of both overkill and all-out competition." These scientists said they would not accept support from "the Strategic Defense Organization that funds star wars."

Mr. President, here are experts who have the technical competence to know what they are talking about. To their great credit they have the integrity to turn their backs on the temptation of millions of dollars of contracts. These are University of Illinois faculty members and scholars. The University of Illinois has one of the Nation's premier computer research centers. The University of Illinois refuseniks are not alone. They are working to secure opposition to SDI from similar experts at such top flight technological institutions as the University of California at Berkeley, the Institute for Theoretical Physics at Santa Barbara, the Fermi Research Center near Chicago, IBM's research center at Yorktown Heights and at Cornell University.

As we might expect the Defense Department is not taking this lying down. The strategic defense initiative office issued press releases announcing that it had formed four consortiums of universities for the research effort. Did they? No. Two of the Nations very top technological institutions said the star wars officials were blowing smoke. Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the California Institute of Technology both declared that the SDI statement misrepresented their position. These blue ribbon institutions had not endorsed or supported star wars. The universities as such were not involved. Only individual researchers at the schools, not the institutes themselves, had been picked for the consortiums. Here is what the president of MIT told the MIT commencement class last June:

> What I find particularly troublesome about SDI funding is the effort to short-circuit the debate and use MIT and other universities as political instruments. Any participation at MIT in SDI funded research should in no way be understood or used as an institutional endorsement of the SDI program.

Mr. President, John Kogut a University of Illinois physics professor put the technical case against star wars simply and emphatically, just listen:

> The type of computerization envisioned for SDI is not feasible. Machines one thousand times faster than the GRAY II super computer would be needed. It's totally beyond the technology that we can imagine. It's certainly irregular that this should be seen as a totally reliable system on which we should stake our national security. The hardware and software are not achievable. The idea of basing a weapons system on this kind of technology is just absurd.

Mr. President, the factual basis of this speech has come from an article in the February 5 special edition of Current News prepared for the Strategic Air Force by Richard C. Gross.

MYTH OF THE DAY: THE BLACK TEEN PREGNANCY RATE CANNOT BE LOWERED

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that the conditions that lead to high rates of black teenage pregnancy cannot be overcome.

It just is not true, and a program in Milwaukee, WI, is proving it right now.

The program is called "Reach for the Stars" and it is attempting to address the root of the problem that has led Milwaukee to have the highest pregnancy rate for black teens in the country.

Listen to what Dr. Janice Anderson, the administrator of HealthReach, a major inner-city HMO and the founder of "Reach for the Stars" has to say:

> Kids need something to work for. And to me there is no greater symbol to a black teenage girl than another black woman who has made it.

And that is what "Reach for the Stars" is all about. Successful, black women speaking to teens, challenging them and motivating them to make something of themselves.

In Dr. Anderson's view, teens need to see women, like themselves, who fought the same odds, overcame the same obstacles, and made it.

Dr. Anderson notes:

> We all admit that we came from poverty. We came from conditions that no one expected us to overcome. But we did it. And we've got to tell it, and tell it fully, so they can know it can be done.

As one woman who donated time to "Reach for the Stars" points out:

> We want them to dream and we want them to believe in themselves. That's why some of the teens have gotten into trouble. They don't believe they can do something else.

Is it working? One indication is the national attention this phenomenal program is receiving. It was recently the subject of a profile on "Good Morning America."

But the real test is the reaction of the teens themselves—the toughest audience imaginable as any parent knows.

And what do they say?

"It made me realize I had a chance."

"They made me feel stronger about myself and what I believe."

As one counselor noted: "I had a young lady approach me who was pregnant and she said, 'You know, if I only could have talked to somebody like you before—I became pregnant— * * *.' There it is."

And there it is, indeed. Successful people teaching success. To Dr. Janice Anderson, whose vision fueled this program and the many, many successful women who are donating their time to make a difference, my hat is off to you. You can clearly make a difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Once again, I regret we are being cut off. I would like to say what I have to say as a free citizen and as a Senator.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR ARMSTRONG

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

RADIO COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, today is a great day in the history of the Senate because it is the first day on which we make available live gavel-to-gavel coverage of debates in the Senate for radio broadcast by those who may desire to broadcast these proceedings.

For the first time, Americans across the Nation will be able to listen in to the Senate debates on actual policy.

Mr. President, I think it is as others have expressed, a historical occasion. There is little I can add to the general round of congratulations that has occurred. Yet as one who has cared about broadcast in the Senate, I would not care to let this opportunity pass without congratulating the two leaders for making this possible, without commending and complimenting the chairman of the Rules Committee, Mr. MATHIAS, the Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD], and particularly my fellow colleague and partner in this effort, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], and others who have made this historic occasion possible.

Mr. President, I also want to call attention to what I think is a noteworthy beginning for broadcast coverage in that virtually the first spoken words to be broadcast; that is, the first statement after the convening of the Senate by the President pro tempore, were words of prayer.

This is not happenstance. It did not have to begin on that note. In fact, the beginning of broadcast coverage with prayer was the result of a wise and deliberate decision by the majority leader. So I want to especially compliment him and congratulate him that he arranged the business of the Senate and the beginning of the broadcast coverage in that way. I applaud him for doing so.

Beginning each legislative session of the Senate with prayer has been the first order of business since the days of the Continental Congress. It was Benjamin Franklin who suggested the daily prayer as a way to acknowledge a superior order and seek guidance, establishing an important principle even at the time when the Founding Fathers were developing institutions to govern this land.

They acknowledged, as we have in the Senate each day since, the provisional nature our being and the need for divine power.

Benjamin Franklin told the Continental Congress, Mr. President:

> The small progress we have made after 4 or 5 weeks close attendance and continual reasoning with each other, our different sentiments on almost every question, is melancholy proof of the intervention of the human understanding. In this situation of this assembly groping, as it were, in the dark to find political truth and scarce able to distinguish it when presented to us, how has it happened, sir, that we have not hitherto once thought of humbly applying to the Father of light to illuminate our understanding?

> In the beginning of the contest with Great Britain when we were sensible of the danger we had daily prayer in this room for divine protection. Our prayers were heard and graciously answered. I therefore beg leave to move that henceforth prayer to implore the blessings of heaven be held in this assembly every morning before we proceed to business.

Mr. Franklin's motion, of course, was adopted, and the tradition has continued to this very day.

So, Mr. President, it seemed especially fitting that we have begun the broadcast coverage of the Senate on this note.

Mr. President, I want to add just one footnote to what has been said about the broadcast coverage.

That is to note that now, 40 full minutes after such coverage has begun, the Chamber is empty, the press gallery is empty and, at least for the moment, we have set to rest the worst fears of those who contemplated broadcast coverage with the thought that the Chamber would be perpetually filled with those who would be seeking to make statements to the Nation via the electronic medium. As of this moment, I do not see any such clamor and it reassures me to think we shall quickly adjust to having coverage by radio. I judge that on the day television coverage is inaugurated, some 40 days hence, there will be, for the first hour or half hour or day, Senators coming to the floor clamoring to express their opinions and views, but this will not last long. Then it will be business as usual in the Senate.

It is business as usual, Mr. President, that I wish to see broadcast and televised, the Senate warts and all. That was the vision of former Senator Howard Baker, who championed forcefully television coverage of the Senate. It was not his desire, nor is it mine, to show something different from the regular order, to show a dressed-up or prettified version of the Senate but the Senate at work with all its foibles, quirks, and unusual proceedings which are inherent in the greatness of this institution.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR TRIBLE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. TRIBLE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

ETHIOPIANS FORCED RESETTLEMENT PROGRAM

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing, along with Senators KASSEBAUM and BOSCHWITZ, a sense-of-the-Congress resolution condemning Ethiopia's program of forcible resettlement which urges the President to consider imposing economic sanctions if the Ethiopian regime continues this inhumane policy.

The reports from Ethiopia are absolutely distressing. The forced resettlement program has caused untold suffering and death. Hundreds of thousands have been coercively sent to other parts of the country, many at gunpoint. The program entails the capture, imprisonment, and forcible relocation of peasants. During this process, families are separated and food and water are systematically withheld so that the victims do not try to escape.

Cultural Survival, a Harvard-based research group, has interviewed refugees in the Sudan who fled Ethiopian resettlement camps. According to those interviews 40 percent of those resettled claimed to have been beaten and 20 percent said they had witnessed others being beaten to death. Eighty percent said their families had been broken up in the resettlement process.

At best, the Mengistu regime has shown a most callous disregard for human lie. At worst, the Government of Ethiopia has carried out a policy of genocide.

Deaths from this draconian policy are conservatively estimated to exceed 100,000 by Medecin Sans Frontieres, a French private voluntary organization. This gruesome total must be directly attributed to the appalling conditions in the resettlement sites.

Most sites have no houses or health facilities. Food is supplied erratically and is inadequate for individuals forced to engage in hard manual labor. Armed political cadres force camp residents to work 10 hours or more a day, 6½ days a week. If residents fail to meet arbitrary quotas, their meager food rations are cut.

The brutal and barbaric policies of the Government of Ethiopia must be condemned by civilized nations around the world. This resolution condemns the forced resettlement policy and urges the President to consider the imposition of economic sanctions if the policy continues. The resolution also urges the President to make every reasonable diplomatic effort to persuade the Mengistu government to abandon its inhumane resettlement program.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States must express its outrage at this policy and I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

I send the concurrent resolution to the desk and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, surveying the Chamber, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 11 a.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Is there further morning business?

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. As I understand, we are about prepared to go back on the balanced budget amendment. I want to urge my colleagues on each side, as I normally do, to be here within 5 minutes with their amendments so that we can dispose of this matter today. I understand there may be amendments. I understand the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is prepared to offer an amendment. Others may have amendments. I hope that we can offer them and not have extended quorum calls or other delays that will eat up most of the day.

It is possible in my view to complete action on the balanced budget amendment by 4 or 5 o'clock and then move to the committee funding resolutions. And that will be necessary because the chairman of the Rules Committee will not be available for the next few days. So we do need to act on the committee funding resolutions. I know Senator STEVENS of Alaska has an amendment, and I believe the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUMPHREY] will have an amendment. The Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON] are joined together in an amendment. So I would hope that we can resolve any problems on the amendments and complete action on the committee funding resolutions.

Then it would be our hope that on tomorrow and Friday, with votes both days, we could move to the water resources bill, Senate bill 1567. Then next week we would be on the budget resolution, Contra aid, regional airport compact, and a number of other items we would like to finish before the Easter recess, which is scheduled to begin the close of business on March 26.

CONCLUSION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the unfinished business.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 225) proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to a Federal balanced budget.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

Thurmond Amendment No. 1652, in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished Senator from Alabama is prepared to offer his amendment. My view is that the managers are on the way, but I am certain they would have no objection to offering the amendment and starting the discussion and when they arrive they can take up the debate. I thank the Senator from Alabama for being here.

AMENDMENT NO. 1659

(Purpose: To modify the waiver provision)

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have an amendment to the proposed constitutional amendment to balance the budget dealing with undeclared wars primarily.

I am a strong supporter of the constitutional amendment to balance the budget. When I first came to the Senate in 1979, in January, I introduced at that time a resolution calling for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget and have been involved in working in the Judiciary Committee and in a balanced budget caucus for many years trying to adopt a resolution which would authorize the submission to the States for ratification of a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget.

As you know, in 1982, the Senate did pass a constitutional amendment calling for a balanced budget by more than the required two-thirds vote. There were 69 votes in favor of it at that time. It was sent to the House of Representatives where, in the House Judiciary Committee, it was bottled up, where the chairman there would not allow it to come up for a committee vote, in order that it might be reported to the floor of the House of Representatives.

In order to bring it up for a vote in the House of Representatives, it was necessary to file a discharge petition. A discharge petition is a petition that has to be signed by more than a majority of the whole number of the House of Representatives, and then it is brought up and voted on without any amendment. It failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds vote that was required in the House of Representatives at that time.

I believe that was in 1982. I know that we passed the Senate version of the constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget in August 1982. Since that time, there has been considerable debate, various articles have been written in numerous publications, and editorials have appeared in numerous newspapers. Many speeches have been made on the floor of the Senate, and I have made numerous speeches advocating the adoption of a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget.

There is one aspect of this amendment as it is presently drafted, in my judgment, that has a void, and that is a void dealing with the issue of undeclared war.

Section 3 of the proposed Senate Joint Resolution 225, the resolution now before the Senate calling for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget, says that Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect. It allows it only in the event of a declaration of war.

Looking back over the history of this Nation, we find that we have had only five undeclared wars. The most recent encounters of the United States in armed conflict with enemies have been, of course, undeclared wars. We fought the Vietnam war without a declaration of war. The Korean action was fought without a declaration of war.

I think there is a defect in the proposed language of the resolution calling for this constitutional amendment to balance the budget, and because of that defect, I wish to offer an amendment to correct it. Therefore, at this time I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 1, strike out lines 16 through 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Section 3. The provisions of this article are automatically waived for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

"The provisions of this article may be waived for any fiscal year in which the United States is engaged in military conflict which causes an imminent and serious military threat to national security and is so declared by a joint resolution, adopted by a majority of the whole number of each House of the Congress, which becomes law. Afterwards any waiver adopted shall be by a joint resolution of like requirements.".

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the amendment I am offering to Senate Joint Resolution 225 is simple and straightforward, and yet it is one that could prove vital to the national security of the United States. Section 3 of Senate Joint Resolution 225, the constitutional amendment to balance the budget, authorizes Congress to waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect. While this exception to the general rule of a balanced budget is necessary in my judgment, it does not go far enough.

This country can be faced with military emergencies which threaten our national security, without a formal declaration of war. Circumstances may arise in which Congress may need to spend significant amounts on national defense without a declaration of war. Congress and the President must be given the necessary flexibility to respond rapidly when a military emergency arises. If the purpose of section 3 is to allow this Nation to respond when the country is involved in conflict which threatens our national security, then it falls short of its intended purpose.

Throughout our history, the United States has engaged in only five declared wars: the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Spanish-American War, the First World War, and the Second World War.

It is interesting to note that the War Between the States was not a declared war.

My amendment provides for the automatic waiver of the provisions of the constitutional amendment when a declared war is in effect. I think that is a substantial change and a needed change.

There could be a war like the Vietnam war, which went on for 11 years, and each year you would have to waive the constitutional amendment pertaining to a balanced budget by a three-fifths vote. We might look back and we would see that the vote to withdraw the troops from Vietnam carried by only 8 votes. The difference between a majority, as my amendment provides, and the three-fifths vote is a difference between 51 and 60, which is 9 votes.

I believe that when a declared war is in effect, the requirements should be automatically suspended, automatically waived, and therefore we should not have to go every year. A war may drag on, and become very unpopular, and it might be that a majority of the Members of Congress might support the activities that are going on, but three-fifths would not. Therefore, I think it is important that that automatic waiver be included, rather than the requirement that each fiscal year that a declared war is in effect, you have to waive it.

My amendment also provides that the provisions can be waived if the United States is engaged in military conflict which causes an imminent and serious military threat to national security.

A statement from a report issued by the Foreign Affairs Division of the Congressional Research Service, "Background Information On The Use of U.S. Armed Forces in Foreign Countries," revised as of 1975, quoting the Harvard Law Review best describes the type of conflicts which are more commonplace today.

Though there may have been a time when . . . changes in legal status were uniquely the result of a formal declaration [of war] this is clearly no longer true today. Countries have long engaged in undeclared hostilities which in terms of the effort involved, the impact on citizens and the effect on domestic and international legal relations are often indistinguishable from a formerly declared war . . . the formal declaration of war in the modern context is often deliberately avoided precisely because of the apparent commitment to total victory and the general hardening of attitudes likely to result.

The report continues:

Twice since the end of the Second World War, first in Korea and then in Indochina, the United States has been heavily engaged in armed conflicts abroad. On other occasions, American troops have been sent to foreign countries in times of crisis, Lebanon in 1958, and the Dominican Republic in 1965. Additional critical situations, including the confrontation in the Formosa Straits in 1955, the Cuban missile crisis in 1962, the seizure of the Mayaguez in 1975, have been met by a use of American military forces.

If this report which I have read from, the Congressional Research Service, "Background Information on the Use of U.S. Armed Forces in Foreign Countries," would be extended to date, it would include additional instances.

I think it is also wise to look at some of the other instances in which we have had undeclared war and to see how serious they were.

We find that in 1914 to 1917, during a time of revolution in Mexico, there were at least two major armed actions by U.S. forces in Mexico. The hostilities included the capture of Vera Cruz and later Pershing's expedition into northern Mexico. In 1927, fighting at Shanghai caused American naval forces and marines to be increased. In March of 1927, a naval guard was stationed at the American consulate at Nanking after national forces captured the city. A United States and British warship fired on Chinese soldiers to protect the escape of Americans and other foreigners.

By the end of 1927, the United States had 44 naval vessels in Chinese waters and 5,670 men ashore.

In 1918, Marines were landed at Vladivostok in June and July to protect the American consulate. The United States landed 7,000 troops which remained until January 29, as part of an allied occupation force.

In September 1918, American troops joined the allied intervention force at Archangel and suffered some 500 casualties.

When a pro-Nasser coup took place in Iraq in January 1958, the President of Lebanon sent an urgent plea for assistance to President Eisenhower saying his country was threatened both by internal rebellion and indirect aggression. President Eisenhower responded by sending 5,000 marines to Beirut to protect American lives and help the Lebanonese maintain their independence. This force was gradually increased to 14,000 soldiers and marines who occupied strategic positions throughout the country.

I think you could go on and on concerning various instances that have occurred pertaining to our involvement in conflict abroad at various times in which there was undeclared war.

I will not specify the instances under which such a waiver would be necessary or appropriate. I am one individual among many individuals. But there have been, throughout the history of our country, approximately 200 instances when the United States has utilized military forces abroad, in situations of conflict, to protect or promote the U.S. interests. Not all of these would move Congress to seek a waiver of the requirements of a balanced budget. I do not think that they should. I think that the language for my exception for undeclared war ought to present safeguards against its misuse and I think that we have framed it in language which will prevent misuse of the waiver for an undeclared war. But Congress certainly should have the flexibility, within the mandates of a constitutional amendment, to allow the Nation to provide for our Nation's security.

I realize that Senate Joint Resolution 225 currently provides for deficit spending by three-fifths vote of the whole number of each House of Congress. I also know the difficulty in obtaining the three-fifths vote. If we are serious about balancing the budget, the decision to operate with a deficit should come at a higher price but not when the security of our Nation is at stake. If there is a military conflict, I would not want the security of our Nation to rest possibly on the difference between 9 votes in the Senate and 43 votes in the House of Representatives.

Under those circumstances, our first—no, our only thought—should be to preserve the security of our country.

I do not offer my amendment lightly. I have drafted the amendment in such a way that provides these safeguards, as I have previously mentioned, against its misuse.

First, if there is a declaration of war, there should be no question that the requirements of a balanced budget are waived. I believe it would be rare in today's arena for war to ever again be formally declared, but we must provide for that possibility.

Second, my amendment provides that the article may be waived for any fiscal year in which the United States is engaged in military conflict which causes an imminent and serious military threat to national security which is so declared by a joint resolution which becomes law.

It also means, under the language, that it has to be declared as a military threat. This joint resolution has to become law. In an attempt to further tighten these requirements, this joint resolution has been drafted so that it would be adopted by a majority of the whole number of each House of Congress. Under current law, a majority of the Senate membership is 51 and the majority of the House of Representatives is 218. That is an additional requirement; whereas, the waiver for the fiscal year in the present section 3 only requires a majority of those present and voting.

My resolution here, which is a joint resolution and which must be signed by the President, requires that the majority must be a majority of the whole number of each House of Congress.

Therefore, there must first be a resolution stating that the United States is engaged in military conflict which causes an imminent and serious military threat to national security. That means you have to be in military conflict and it must be determined that it causes an imminent, meaning an immediate, and a serious military threat to national security. That word "military" is in there. It means that it would eliminate matters which are not of a military nature.

Then after that resolution has been declared, there would be a second requirement.

The second requirement means that there would be two separate votes. The first, of course, as I have described, is a joint resolution which becomes law, meaning it is either signed by the President, or the President's veto is overriden, declaring the threat, and the second vote, would then be on a waiver of the constitutional amendment of a balanced budget in time of undeclared war. That additional step would be to vote for the waiver and the waiver would last only for the duration of the fiscal year. And if the undeclared war continued, it would have to be voted each fiscal year.

The vote on the waiver would have to be adopted: by a majority of the whole membership of each House of Congress and it would have to become law.

Now the waiver under section 3 of the present proposed Senate Joint Resolution 225 does not have the President involved in the waiver. It says only that the Congress may waive the provisions. My amendment requires the President to participate in the resolution, declaring the threat, and then in the second requirement of a waiver.

Now these are safeguards. The reason for the safeguards is that you would not have a waiver during a fiscal year when there would be an instance like Grenada, a 7-day war. Grenada involved a military conflict. But, in my judgment, it did not involve or cause an imminent and serious military threat to the security of the United States.

I would also point out another recent instance involving the marines in Lebanon, our involvement there as a part of a multinational peacekeeping force. In my judgment, they did become involved in military conflict. But that military conflict that they were involved in did not—did not—cause an imminent or a serious threat to the national security.

So, therefore, a Grenada or a situation like Lebanon, at Beirut during the time after the marine barracks were bombed by the truck with dynamite by the suicide driver, those instances would not have qualified to bring about a waiver. You would have to have us involved in a situation like Korea, in a situation like Vietnam, in order to bring this into being and for the requirements to be met.

Without my amendment, an unusual situation is created. Under the War Powers Act, the President is required in every possible instance to consult with Congress before introducing American Armed Forces into hostilities or potential conflicts unless there has been a declaration of war or some specific congressional authorization. It also requires the President to report to Congress the introduction of forces into hostilities or imminent hostilities, and the Congress must authorize the use of force within 60 days or the forces must be withdrawn. There are provisions that do allow for the extension up to 90 days.

Now this creates a situation where Congress, by a simple majority vote, has the authority to decide whether troops will remain in a conflict situation, but it would require—under the provisions of the drafted Senate Joint Resolution 225, the resolution before the Senate right now without my amendment—it would require a three-fifths vote to provide additional funds to protect those troops.

In other words, under the War Powers Act, Congress could approve an action by a majority vote, a majority vote of those present and voting, but under the provisions of the proposed constitutional amendment, a three-fifths vote would be necessary in order to provide the funds. Now I think that is an unusual situation.

I think you have to read and see the factual situation that would arise and the applicability of the War Powers Act to my amendment. You would have a military conflict. You would have the War Powers Act coming into being. You would have at least 60 days. Then you would have, at the same time, the matter concerning the adoption of a resolution to the effect that there was an imminent and serious threat to the national security. And then you would have the additional waiver that would be required.

This means that, a military conflict that would be going on in which there would be no declaration of war would have to be read in pari materia with the application of the War Powers Act. This would be a safeguard and would mean that you would not have a waiver on frivalous instances.

My amendment is directed primarily toward Vietnam, toward Korea, toward those instances in which we have been involved for a sustained period of time and in which the United States is in a similar situation as if they had declared war.

So we have put the safeguards here to protect against its misuse. And, to me, the amendment that I have offered provides these safeguards and it is very important.

I do not know what the intentions of my colleagues would be, but I know that some of those in this body who may oppose my amendment favor a strong national defense.

There are those of us—especially under the difficult constraints of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings—who think it is time that defense fended for itself. But this is not simply a budget matter. We are in the process of amending the Constitution. Our frustrations today should not impact upon our decisions of tomorrow.

In the 97th Congress, I offered an amendment somewhat broader in scope. In the spirit of compromise, I have clarified the language. Part of the language of the amendment that I am offering today was offered by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator STROM THURMOND, in committee. However, Senator THURMOND later withdrew his amendment.

When I offered a similar amendment on national security in the 97th Congress, the administration not only initially supported, but offered suggestions on drafting part of that amendment. On July 13, 1982, the administration issued a statement stating their support of the constitutional amendment. Then they stated:

> The administration does, however, believe that section 3—that is the section suspending the article in the event of declared war—should be broadened and would support the following change:
> The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect, or there is an unforeseen and imminent threat to the national security.

At one time during the summer of 1982, we met with members of the administration to discuss their concern for this national defense emergency exception.

Also, on the date that this came up—and before it lacked only four votes from being adopted—on August 3, 1982, when we voted on the undeclared war exception to the constitutional amendment to balance the budget, the Secretary of Treasury, Donald Regan, testified before a committee of the House, and in that testimony he made this statement:

> A wide variety of events, not necessarily entailing a declaration of war, may pose threats to national security. The administration should encourage the Congress to amend by constitutional amendment to allow a broader range of events, unforeseen events posing an imminent threat to national security to qualify for a waiver.

He made that statement before a House Judiciary Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law. That was Donald Regan who was then the Secretary of Treasury.

Now, I do not bring this issue up to infer that the administration supported my amendment on the final vote in the 97th Congress. Frankly, I think they got talked out of the support that they would have given to the amendment that they helped me draft, and which I submitted because they had some fears that they might lose the votes of some doves in the U.S. Senate. And, again, that is a problem.

You have some fiscal conservatives who consider themselves doves, and who do not want to look at defense in a proper manner. At least, that is the way I would classify the way that they look at it. But I do not think that they ought to be looking at it from that viewpoint.

We are writing a constitutional amendment. It will live for years and years. And we ought not to let political expediency determine the language that is involved when the national security of this Nation is one of the primary issues.

To me, the fact that the national security is the issue means we ought to write the language for a waiver in such a manner as to look toward the future and to provide for the exceptions to provide reasonable safeguards against its misuse.

So I think that really the administration somehow got talked out of their position. I do not bring this up at this time to say that they supported my amendment on final vote in the 97th Congress, or that the administration currently supports my amendment. Frankly, I do not know. After working with them for a long period of time on this matter, they know in the committees and have known that I have been working since I offered a similar amendment to this in committees, and I have not heard from them. So I assume they maybe they do not support it.

But I want to point out that there have been others that have expressed concern over the lack of flexibility in the declared war provision as it is written. And I think they should have concern. And every Senator ought to have concern about the lack of flexibility in the written resolution that is before you, particularly in regard to times of undeclared war.

It is important, I think, that we face the facts, and the facts as we know them. We know them from history. A person that does not study history is going to make errors again in the future. We look back in history, and we see that we have only had five declared wars. And that in recent years our activities in military conflicts have been in undeclared wars. I think that should illustrate from a historical viewpoint that we need to provide flexibility concerning the issue of undeclared war.

Well, I really feel that the opposition to my amendment is not based upon the language of the amendment or the principle of the amendment, but more upon the political climate. Some fear that my amendment will weaken the chances of the constitutional amendment's passage. I do not really share this fear. But I have an even greater fear that in the absence of this needed flexibility, we risk an even greater danger. Many will argue that, if there is truly an emergency, we will have no difficulty in reaching the three-fifths vote.

But there have been some close votes in the history of this country. And I think we ought to look back at some of the close votes that we have had in the history of this country, and in some instances, if they had not carried, this country would have faced disaster.

The Senate voted to declare war on Great Britain in 1812 by a seven-vote margin. The vote approving the withdrawal of troops from Vietnam passed the Senate by nine votes.

The point I want to make, as I mentioned these instances, is the difference between the majority of the whole membership of each House, and a three-fifths vote of the whole membership of each House that would be required—that there are nine votes in the Senate and 43 votes in the House.

I do not believe that this constitutional amendment in 1982 in the House failed to achieve the two-thirds vote by more than 43 votes. I do not remember. But it seems to me that it was less than 43 votes, and that it failed to achieve the necessary two-thirds vote over there.

I pointed out already two instances where nine votes in the Senate would have made a considerable difference. The vote to provide statutory authority for the war powers resolutions for continued U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon for up to 18 months, after the enactment of the resolution, passed by a vote of 54 to 46, an 8-vote difference.

The issue of Contra aid is going to come up. Is there anybody in the Senate that thinks that Contra aid is going to carry more than nine votes in this Senate? Well, I support the President. But I want to say to you, and to the administration if they will listen, if they think Contra aid is going to pass by more than nine votes, they are certainly engaging in wishful thinking.

What about the House of Representatives? Is there anyone who thinks the House is going to vote Contra aid by more than 43 votes, and support the administration's position over there? Nicaragua, Central America—all of this—in the future may cause serious problems.

They are close to home. We have not had, since the Cuban crisis, anything as close to home as we have here. I think you ought to give careful consideration to it.

But there is one vote that I think should convince anybody who is on the fence about this amendment. That simple vote meant the difference, in my judgment, between victory and defeat for the United States in World War II.

That vote occurred on August 12, 1941, when the extension of the Selective Service Act came up, the draft.

In the debate that occurred on this amendment in the 97th Congress, Senator Jennings Randolph, who is not now in the Senate, joined me in supporting my amendment at that time, which was quite similar. It was to a similar resolution on a balanced budget in the 97th Congress.

Senator Randolph supported it and said that he was in the House of Representatives, on August 12, 1941, and that his vote, as well as the others' votes, was the difference, because there was a one-vote difference concerning the extension of the Selective Service Act at that time. On August 12, 1941, the draft was extended by a vote of 203 to 202. One vote—after many hours of bitter debate and many harsh words. It was at a time when Hitler was bent on destroying Europe, yet the Selective Service Extension Act was passed by a single vote.

Less than 4 months later, Japan attacked Pearl Harbor. If we had not continued the Selective Service Act at that time and had gone through a 4-month dismantling of the Selective Service System, I shudder to think what might have been the outcome relative to World War II.

One vote made the difference then. It can make the difference now. All I am asking is that we include within this constitutional amendment the ability to respond in times other than declared war.

The preamble to our Constitution reads:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

We will soon be celebrating the 200th anniversary of the Constitution, a constitution written not just with a vision of today, but one with a vision of tomorrow. It is a vision that has served us well.

Mr. President, I will ask unanimous consent that a report from the Congressional Research Service which lists the instances of the use of the U.S. Armed Forces abroad from 1798 to 1983, be printed in the RECORD. This is Report No. 83-204F. The list through 1975 is reprinted from the U.S. Congress, House Committee on International Relations, now Foreign Affairs, Subcommittee on International Security and Scientific Affairs. "Background Information on the Use of U.S. Armed Forces in Foreign Countries, 1975," revision: Committee print, 94th Congress, 1st session, prepared by the Foreign Affairs Division, Congressional Research Service. This shows the instances of our participation in military conflict in foreign countries during this period of time, only five of which were during a declared war.

Mr. President, I do not want to prolong debate on this. We can go ahead and proceed to a vote. I do want to emphasize that my amendment involves the President. The present language in section 3 does not have the President involved.

My amendment would automatically waive the provision of a balanced budget in time of war. It would, in time of undeclared war, provide the flexibility to waive the constitutional amendment and not require a three-fifths vote. I have listed some instances, like the Vietnam war, the Korean war, where I think we ought to bring to mind the problems that existed. I seriously question whether or not we could have waived by a three-fifths vote in the last year of the Vietnam war the requirements of the constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget when our national security needed it so much.

I think this provides a flexibility that is needed and it is something that will add to this constitutional amendment. I strongly support the constitutional amendment to balance the budget. I think there are some corrections that should be made. There are some drafting errors.

I have been working with Senator ARMSTRONG on the matter of self-enforcement.

I feel very strongly, however, about the exception in times of undeclared war.

I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD this report from the Congressional Research Service on instances of the use of U.S. Armed Forces abroad from 1798 to 1983.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INSTANCES OF USE OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES ABROAD, 1798-1983 [1]

The following list indicates approximately 200 times that the United States has utilized military forces abroad in situations of conflict to protect or promote U.S. interests. Because of differing judgments over the kinds of actions to be included, other lists may include more or fewer instances.[2]

The instances vary greatly in size of operation, legal authorization, and significance. The number of troops involved range from a few sailors or Marines landed to protect American lives and property to hundreds of thousands in Vietnam and millions in World War II. Some actions were of short duration and some lasted a number of years. In some instances the President acted solely under his powers as Commander in Chief; five were declared wars. Inclusion in this list does not connote either legality or significance.

1798-1800—Undeclared Naval War with France. This contest included land actions, such as that in the Dominican Republic, city of Puerto Plata, where marines captured a French privateer under the guns of the forts.

1801-05—Tripoli. The First Barbary War, including the George Washington and Philadelphia affairs and the Eaton expedition, during which a few marines landed with United States Agent William Eaton to raise a force against Tripoli in an effort to free the crew of the Philadelphia. Tripoli declared war but not the United States.

1806—Mexico (Spanish territory). Capt. Z.M. Pike, with a platoon of troops, invaded Spanish territory at the headwaters of the Rio Grande deliberately and on orders from Gen. James Wilkinson. He was made prisoner without resistance at a fort he constructed in present day Colorado, taken to Mexico, later released after seizure of his papers.

1806-10—Gulf of Mexico. American gunboats operated from New Orleans against Spanish and French privateers, such as La Fitte, off the Mississippi Delta, chiefly under Capt. John Shaw and Master Commandant David Porter.

1810—West Florida (Spanish territory). Gov. Claiborne of Louisiana, on orders of the President, occupied with troops territory in dispute east of Mississippi as far as the Pearl River, later the eastern boundary of Louisiana. He was authorized to seize as far east as the Peridido River. No armed clash.

1812—Amelia Island and other parts of east Florida, then under Spain. Temporary possession was authorized by President Madison and by Congress, to prevent occupation by any other power; but possession was obtained by Gen. George Matthews in so irregular a manner that his measures were disavowed by the President.

1812-15—Great Britain. War of 1812. Formally declared.

1813—West Florida (Spanish territory). On authority given by Congress, General Wilkinson seized Mobile Bay in April with 600 soldiers. A small Spanish garrison gave way. Thus U.S. advanced into disputed territory to the Perdido River, as projected in 1810. No fighting.

1813-14—Marquesas Islands. Built a fort on island of Nukahiva to protect three prize ships which had been captured from the British.

1814—Spanish Florida. Gen Andrew Jackson took Pensacola and drove out the British with whom the United States was at war.

1814-25—Caribbean. Engagements between pirates and American ships or squadrons took place repeatedly especially ashore and offshore about Cuba, Puerto Rico, Santo Domingo, and Yucatan. Three thousand pirate attacks on merchantmen were reported between 1815 and 1823. In 1822 Commodore James Biddle employed a squadron of two frigates, four sloops of war, two brigs, four schooners, and two gunboats in the West Indies.

1815—Algiers. The second Barbary War, declared by the opponents but not by the United States. Congress authorized an expedition. A large fleet under Decatur attacked Algiers and obtained indemnities.

1815—Tripoli. After securing an agreement from Algiers, Decatur demonstrated with his squadron at Tunis and Tripoli, where he secured indemnities for offenses during the War of 1812.

1816—Spanish Florida. United States forces destroyed Nicholls Fort, called also Negro Fort, which harbored raiders making forays into United States territory.

1816-18—Spanish Florida.—First Seminole War. The Seminole Indians, whose area was a resort for escaped slaves and border ruffians, were attacked by troops under Generals Jackson and Gaines and pursued into northern Florida. Spanish posts were attacked and occupied, British citizens executed. There was no declaration or congressional authorization but the Executive was sustained.

1817—Amelia Island (Spanish territory off Florida). Under orders of President Monroe, United States forces landed and expelled a group of smugglers, adventurers, and freebooters.

1818—Oregon. The U.S.S. Ontario, dispatched from Washington, landed at the Columbia River and in August took possession. Britain had conceded sovereignty but Russia and Spain asserted claims to the area.

1820-23—Africa. Naval units raided the slave traffic pursuant to the 1819 act of Congress.

1822—Cuba. United States naval forces suppressing piracy landed on the northwest coast of Cuba and burned a pirate station.

1823—Cuba. Brief landings in pursuit of pirates occurred April 8 near Escondido; April 16 near Cayo Blanco; July 11 at Siquapa Bay; July 21 at Cape Cruz; and October 23 at Camrioca.

1824—Cuba. In October the U.S.S. Porpoise landed bluejackets near Matanzas in pursuit of pirates. This was during the cruise authorized in 1822.

1824—Puerto Rico (Spanish territory). Commodore David Porter with a landing party attacked the town of Fajardo which had sheltered pirates and insulted American naval officers. He landed with 200 men in November and forced an apology.

1825—Cuba. In March cooperating American and British forces landed at Sagua La Grande to capture pirates.

1827—Greece. In October and November landing parties hunted pirates on the islands of Argenteire, Miconi, and Andross.

1831-32—Falkland Islands. To investigate the capture of three American sailing vessels and to protect American interests.

1841—Drummond Island, Kingsmill Group. To avenge the murder of a seaman by the natives.

1841—Samoa—February 24. To avenge the murder of an American seaman on Upolu Island.

1842—Mexico. Commodore T.A.C. Jones, in command of a squadron long cruising off California, occupied Monterey, Calif., on October 19, believing war had come. He discovered peace, withdrew, and saluted. A similar incident occurred a week later at San Diego.

1843—China. Sailors and marines from the St. Louis were landed after a clash between Americans and Chinese at the trading post in Canton.

1843—Africa, November 29 to December 16. Four United States vessels demonstrated and landed various parties (one of 200 marines and sailors) to discourage piracy and the slave trade along the Ivory coast, etc., and to punish attacks by the natives on American seamen and shipping.

1844—Mexico. President Tyler deployed U.S. forces to protect Texas against Mexico, pending Senate approval of a treaty of annexation. (Later rejected.) He defended his action against a Senate resolution of inquiry.

1846-48—Mexico, the Mexican War. President Polk's occupation of disputed territory precipitated it. War formally declared.

1849—Smyrna. In July a naval force gained release of an American seized by Austrian officials.

1853-54—Ryukyu and Bonin Islands. Commodore Perry on three visits before going to Japan and while waiting for a reply from Japan made a naval demonstration, landing marines twice, and secured a coaling concession from the ruler of Naha on Okinawa. He also demonstrated in Bonion Islands. All to secure facilities for commerce.

1857—Nicaragua—April to May, November to December. To oppose William Walker's attempt to get control of the country. In May Commander C.H. Davis of the United States Navy, with some marines, received Walker's surrender and protected his men from the retaliation of native allies who had been fighting Walker. In November and December of the same year United States vessels Saratoga, Wabash, and Fulton opposed another attempt of William Walker on Nicaragua. Commodore Hiram Paulding's act of landing marines and compelling the removal of Walker to the United States, was tacitly disavowed by Secretary of State Lewis Cass, and Paulding was forced into retirement.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I commend the able and distinguished Senator from Alabama for his excellent contributions in the efforts to pass a balanced budget constitutional amendment. The Senator from Alabama is a prominent member of the Judiciary Committee and renders the country a fine service.

I regret that we cannot go along with this amendment. We do not think it is necessary. We think it will encumber this process. We feel that our amendment as now written takes care of the situation.

Mr. President, I believe Senator HEFLIN and I and virtually all those who support the constitutional amendment want to make sure that Congress retains the flexibility necessary to respond in a national security crisis. I believe the Senate Joint Resolution 225 provides this flexibility.

Under this resolution, should we become involved in a military conflict or face any other military situation which causes an imminent threat to the Nation's security, Congress would have several options available to it.

First, Congress could waive the balanced budget requirement by a three-fifths vote and provide whatever amount necessary to address the threat. It is Senator HEFLIN's concern that three-fifths may not be achievable to address what amounts to an emergency security risk to the Nation.

But I submit, Mr. President, that no military conflict which truly amounted to an imminent threat to our Nation's security would be abandoned because Congress could not muster a three-fifths vote. Congress has always responded to those emergencies where the security of the Nation is at stake.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a table showing that Congress has met emergency situations with votes easily surpassing the 60 percent necessary under Senate Joint Resolution 225.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[3] This and subsequent mentions of Presidential reports refer to reports to Congress pursuant to the War Powers Resolution (Public Law 93-148, November 7, 1973).

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, second, in those instances when a majority, but less than three-fifths, of the Senate or House believe there to be a threat to the Nation's security, the same majority could reduce spending in other areas of the budget or increase taxes to combat the threat.

I have no fear that Congress is going to allow a threat to exist and not take care of it. They have always done it in the past. They do it now; they will do it in the future.

Third, Mr. President, Congress can maintain a contingency fund as part of their approved balanced budget to be activated by a simple majority when needed to address the military threat if they want to do so.

Mr. President, I again commend the Senator from Alabama for his commitment to what is the primary responsibility of the Federal Government; that is, the defense of the Nation. That is the full responsibility of this country, to defend this Nation, to defend its people. I believe and my record shows that I share that commitment. I am convinced, however, that Senate Joint Resolution 225 will not deprive Congress of its ability to provide for the defense of the Nation. For these reasons, Mr. President, I oppose this amendment and feel it should be defeated.

[2] H.J. Res. 447 was approved in less than 53 hrs. after President Johnson's request.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I respect, perhaps as no other Senator, the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND], my chairman on the Judiciary Committee, a ranking member of the Armed Services Committee, a man to whom I feel great gratitude for such contributions as I have been able to make in this body as chairman of the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism. I have similar respect for my distinguished friend and colleague from Utah [Mr. HATCH] who, I know, shares the views just expressed by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND]. So it is with humility but with great sincerity that I ask them to consider what is at stake in the answer given by the President pro tempore to the postulation by my senior colleague from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] concerning his amendment.

First, the Senator from South Carolina said there are a number of examples in which three-fifths of the Senate—of the whole number of both Houses of Congress—met the requirement of providing for the national defense in a number of instances. I would have to say that there are very many instances in which the vote was less than that, and I can give references to them, and I shall submit them for inclusion in the RECORD by unanimous consent.

As far as passing legislation to cut spending is concerned, while that is theoretically correct, I am sure the Senator from South Carolina would realize that in a case such as that which gave rise to the Truman doctrine, for example, when guerrillas in Greece and Turkey breaking through the hills—let us take an example similar to that and say that it occurs in October of a year and we want to respond, as President Truman did, with some support for them. That means an expenditure of money. That support might be economic, it might be a military gesture which ends up in a military involvement—I would hope not, but at least if we do make a military gesture, it tends to deter the continuation of that event, it tends to deter the continuation of progress by the enemy toward the taking away of a U.S. interest. I believe that in such a situation, there would not be enough time, practically speaking, to decide what spending we would have to cut for the year in question.

Indeed, I ask my friends and colleagues to consider this point. I do not think the amendment of my senior colleague from Alabama goes far enough, because his amendment asks that we have a military conflict actually existing before we are able to go to this majority vote under his amendment. How many times has Congress, led properly by the President of the United States, undertaken to send the 6th Fleet to the eastern Mediterranean or the 7th Fleet to the Formosa Straits, or alerted our aircraft, as we did during the Cuban missile crisis and deployed them around Key West, and sent carriers to the threatened region? All of those things cost money.

How many times have we come up with appropriations for economic aid, which cost money, but which, during the days when we enjoyed a bipartisan foreign policy in the House and the Senate, were deterrent, effective and economical, not only in defending our interests but in appropriately meeting the need with less than the sacrifice of American blood?

In this frenzy of trying to balance the budget—which I admit is a necessary goal and I am very much in favor of the constitutional amendment—I am not in favor and am strongly opposed to an amendment to the Constitution which would not only change the Constitution but would betray the most basic fundamental principle of that Constitution. Any nation's constitution, including ours, contains the understanding and the statement that the reason for the existence of the government is to ensure the survival of the nation. To reach the height of folly and say that in order, in a given year, to keep appropriations within a given level by a plan—although well-intended and well-needed—to keep a balanced budget, we would not respond to an unexpected, imminent threat to the security of this country by providing for our common defense—to do that is, to me, an "Alice in Wonderland" approach, involving the best men I know in this body who, in the interest of doing one good thing, are prepared to accept the risk of a worse thing, a much worse thing, occurring.

I do not wish to be a superpatriot; I do not wish to posture on this issue. I only ask that we consider where in the Constitution one finds justification for establishing a rule that a three-fifths majority is required to appropriate money to provide for the common defense. Where in the Constitution do we find justification for the idea that keeping a balanced budget for a given year takes priority over providing for the common defense? I sincerely ask my colleagues to consider what we are doing.

No one here wants us to have a balanced budget amendment more than I. But I do not want to succumb to hysteria of taking a step which, in my view, is insane and unconstitutional. I agree that we can amend the Constitution, but I do not think it was meant to be amended in a way that would betray and violate it's fundamental principles.

This is not an addition to the Constitution; this is a fundamental change in the perception of what government is. I implore my liberal colleagues as well as my conservative colleagues to think carefully about what we are doing. I would have asked my senior colleague, as I did the last time he proposed a similar amendment, if he would not consider amending his own amendment by leaving out the words, "military conflict." We would be forcing the President of the United States, I think, to make up an excuse to have a military conflict, which could cost American lives, before we would appropriate the money necessary for the national defense.

Why, if it is clear enough to us that the money would be to provide for our common defense, and if that is sufficiently clear to the executive department—which is supposed to have the lead in foreign policy in providing for the common defense—and sufficiently clear for a majority in Congress, which has been the rule up to now, why should we not permit that to be the case with the constitutional amendment we are considering?

If this amendment is defeated, I may offer another, because I believe the issue which we are discussing is one that this body has delayed too long in confronting.

I do not believe that any of my colleagues are guilty of a lack of patriotism. Perhaps it is my own stupidity that I cannot see what others see. I am willing to admit that. But I ask what is wrong with what I am saying?

Mr. EVANS and Mr. SIMON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President and my colleagues, I rise in opposition to the amendment by my good friend from Alabama. I have great respect for him. I have the good fortune to sit next to him in the Judiciary Committee and have profited by that experience. And I respect my other colleague from Alabama, Senator DENTON, for his sincerity. Many of us have had the privilege—and it has been a privilege—to serve overseas with the services but few have been asked to make the kind of sacrifices that he has made, and so his words carry special meaning.

First of all, let me say, as I would expect from Senator HEFLIN, this is a well-crafted amendment. All of us—I think this applies without any question to 100 Members of this body—want a strong national defense. The two questions are, is this amendment needed and is it desirable? In response to both of those, I come up with a negative. First, in genuine emergencies or even in emergencies of a lesser nature, Congress has been willing to provide the necessary financing. The Gulf of Tonkin resolution, for example, passed with an 88 to 2 vote, one of the more controversial matters.

I agree with my colleague from Alabama, Senator HEFLIN, when he says we ought to look at history. If you look at the constitutional convention, one of the things that the founders of our country said was, we better put some restraints on the military, and for that reason they made it not an easy thing for the United States to get into war.

Senator HEFLIN makes another point that is very valid, and that is undeclared wars are going to be the kinds of things that we are going to get into in the future, the kind of situation like we have in Nicaragua. The question is, can we respond to those under this statement, without the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. My answer is clearly in the affirmative.

Let us take a look at the Defense Department appropriation right now and the money they have available. They have roughly $60 billion that is available that is not contracted for right now. In addition, in fiscal year 1987, they are asking for $86.4 billion for operations, which can be transferred for emergency operations.

Second, Senator DENTON brings up a point—and I think it is a valid point—how do we respond to something like the situation in Greece, or the situation in Turkey that President Truman faced?

The reality is, we are going to be facing those situations and we should not use those situations as excuses for creating huge deficits. Harry Truman, in the middle of the Korean war, in 1951, had a budget surplus of $6.1 billion. Harry Truman, to his everlasting credit, came to the American people and said, "We are involved in this war. We are going to have to pay for it as we go along."

If we permit the Heflin amendment to be adopted, we make it too easy to find excuses for creating deficits. We should not make defense spending and creating deficits unnecessarily for defense spending easier than for other things. We want to protect the national defense. We can do that within the budgets we have. We have the experience, the precedent of other Presidents who have acted in the past, who have seen to it that we had a balanced budget as we moved on military emergencies. And then if we get into a World War II kind of situation—and we all hope and pray we will not—there is not going to be any question that Congress is going to vote that authority. We will. We have in the past. We will in the future.

I have great respect for my colleagues from Alabama. I think it would be imprudent for this body to pass their amendment. At an appropriate time, Mr. President, I will make a motion to table. I do not want to restrain any further debate at this point, however.

Mr. EVANS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. EVANS. Thank you, Mr. President.

I think we have heard this morning an eloquent presentation by both the senior and junior Senators from Alabama. They point up very well one of the weaknesses, not the only one with this constitutional amendment, but nonetheless a major weakness. I would like to, first, before speaking specifically on this amendment and how it might be even expanded, read to you the testimony of Roy Ash, which was given to the Senate Judiciary Committee last spring. He points to another threat to the national security of this country in the way a budget amendment like this would work:

> I believe, and I'm sure others of this committee do, that we shouldn't play around with our defense capability. Yet, if this amendment were operative, defense would become the tail end of the budget whipsaw. The best budget is, necessarily, an estimate. As the year progresses, acutal spending will vary from the estimate. But the constitutional amendment would require that actual outlays for the year conform to plan amounts or someone will have violated the Constitution. Let's assume we're racing through the year, are 60 to 90 days from its end, and find that $15 billion has to be removed from spending in these remaining days. Such variations do happen. Interest expenditures can't be cut. Would Social Security and other entitlements be exempt? (If they're not, who decides how to immediately cut which programs? There's no time for the regular executive-legislative process to work.) If these large dollar programs were exempt, defense is the only other expenditure of a magnitude sufficient to accommodate the short-term cut requirements. Do we really want to subordinate defense preparedness to a higher order goal of balancing out national arithmetic? Yet, if quick defense money is not saved on short notice, someone goes to jail, so to speak, for violating the Constitution.

That is a quote for Roy Ash, who, as I said yesterday, was the distinguished Director of the Office of Management and Budget under the Nixon and Ford administrations.

Listening to my distinguished colleague from Illinois this morning in response to the Senators from Alabama, I think he carries on that case and gives me greater fear that that is precisely what would happen when he talks about the ability of the Defense Department to respond—to respond because they have $60 billion of uncontracted money and $84 billion in operations which somehow could be easily shifted around. He talks about the excuses for creating huge deficits, but it must be pointed out that this budget amendment to the Constitution does not allow any deficits. We are not talking about huge deficits or small deficits. We are talking about no deficits. We are talking about pinpointing at the end of each fiscal year precisely and absolutely the kind of budget balancing which is going to be exceedingly difficult and which will, in my view and in the view of Roy Ash, ultimately fall more harshly on the national security of this country than on any other element of the budget.

Now let me speak to that splendid presentation of the Senators from Alabama.

They point to—the senior Senator from Alabama particularly—the number of instances where we have had clear national security problems and where the Congress of the United States responded by only a simple majority.

I suggest that all the arguments used on behalf of this amendment could be equally valid and ought to be equally applied in an economic sense as well as a military sense. The wording of the proposed amendment talks about imminent and serious military threat to national security. I think it is very possible that we could have an equally imminent and serious economic threat to our national security, to our national well-being, to our national solvency, and would find the same difficulty in response that the sponsor of the amendment suggests would apply to the military.

It would be hard to say that Black Friday of October 1929 was not a serious economic problem for the country and, if repeated today, would be an enormous, staggering economic problem that would affect this Nation.

Who could say that the days of bank closure and the early days of 1933 were not an imminent and serious economic threat to the well-being or even the security of our country?

I think this amendment has clearly pointed up one of the weaknesses of this constitutional amendment as a whole. It should be corrected. But, in my view, it should apply equally to the serious and imminent economic threats as to the serious and imminent military threats.

In changing the Constitution, we are attempting to do something that is permanent. Every word in our Constitution, with the single exception of prohibition, has remained there to this day—from its adoption, either as a Constitution or as an amendment, it has remained permanent. And it is the presumption of this amendment, that it indeed would be permanent. We would be permanently held captive to a potential, determined minority of this House or the other House who could insist that their minority viewpoint thwart the will of the majority—not only of this Congress, but also what might well be the will of the people of the country as a whole.

That has no place in the Constitution.

While I believe this is a step forward—and I will support the amendment of the Senator from Alabama—I also believe that it does not go far enough. There are equal threats to this Nation that are economic in nature and can be just as rapid, just as sharp, just as threatening to the country as the military threats which the Senator has suggested.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I appreciate the kindness of the Senator from Washington and the sincerity and well-intendedness of his thoughts on this subject. I find it difficult to think of an economic threat as dangerous as, say, a nuclear strike in the day in which we might have an SDI capability. I do respect his views. I simply focus mine on the military or security threats and on interests overseas, because that is what I have been studying.

I should like to have the kind attention of the Senator from Utah, so that somebody who is deeply interested in the other side of this issue could hear just one thing.

I just wanted to offer some of the examples of history in which the United States has had to take actions in the interest of its security, in which we did not have a three-fifths majority in the Senate, and let us keep this in mind as we go through these examples.

Wars can be deterred. Wars are failures in diplomacy. Wars are a resort after all other means fail. We in the United States do not want war. The Soviet Union only wants it when violence is required to achieve the world revolution. We are not after world revolution. We want peace. We want justice. The Soviets want world revolution by violence when necessary. But even they would resort to it last.

So there are examples in which we tried to avert tragedy. Keep in mind that in World War I the Germans took actions such as the sinking of the Lusitania. They knew they might draw the United States into the war because they thought the United States would not have enough time to mobilize and become a factor in the war. Our national survival depends on our remembering such history.

In World War II, Hitler made the same decision based on the same rationale. He took actions which he knew would cause the United States to come into the war, but he did it as a calculated risk, thinking we would not have time to mobilize. In other words, the United States was unprepared. The unpreparedness brought on the war. The unpreparedness brought on the loss of lives in the war. The unpreparedness brought on the butchery of World War II, which appalled the principals who were drawn into that conflict.

So there have been actions which we took to deter war.

May we have order, please, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, one example: Prior to 1936, the Washington Treaty limited the authorized naval strength of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan to a 5-5-3 ratio, respectively. That treaty expired in 1936, and Great Britain and Japan began building in excess of all prior treaty limitations. A bill was introduced in the House to authorize sufficient buildup of our naval strength to reachieve the 5-5-3 ratio, and the report of the House Committee on Naval Affairs on that bill, H.R. 9218 stated:

> It is essential to have, for our proper national defense, the increase provided in this bill, or else the security of our Nation is jeopardized. * * * The increase authorized in this bill will furnish the minimum national defense necessary to attain our national security and preserve our Republic.

Senator Walsh stated in support of the bill:

> The question which the bill presents, and the only question, is the question of national security and safety, and, to that end, the maintenance of an adequate Navy.
> The bill was passed by the Senate on May 3, 1938, by a vote of 56 to 28, two votes short of a three-fifths majority.

Again, that action was not sufficient to dissuade Germany from deciding that the United States was not sufficiently prepared to deter Germany from taking actions which it knew would draw us into the war, but it was a step in the right direction. With more steps like that, we could have saved a lot of lives.

As another example, after the outbreak of World War II, Congress passed the Neutrality Act of 1939, the so-called Cash and Carry Act, permitting belligerent nations to purchase war materials in the United States and transport them abroad in their own vessels with payment only in cash.

For those of us who remember history, let us go back to those days. Churchill and Roosevelt, our President, were in earnest communication regarding the need to oppose the Nazi aggression in the world. The President was trying to prepare the United States. Some of us might remember that in Louisiana, our soldiers were drilling with broomsticks, which helped to encourage Hitler to take the moves which brought us into World War II.

President Roosevelt urged Congress to pass a bill allowing the manufacture and provision of weapons to nations at war with the Axis powers so that the flow of necessary weapons to Britain would not be stopped.

In response to that request, Congress passed H.R. 1776, the Lend-Lease Act, which empowered the President to authorize various heads of Government departments and agencies to manufacture and procure defense articles for the government of any country whose defense the President deemed vital to the defense of the United States and to exchange, lease, lend, or otherwise dispose of defense articles to such countries.

I will not give the quotation from Secretary of War Stimson, but he said it was the most important legislative achievement of the entire war, leading to our victory.

Again, the actions that I am talking about and the reason for my amendment, which I may offer independently or as an amendment in the second degree to my senior colleague's amendment, is to deter war and do it economically.

The House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs concluded in its report on H.R. 1776, the Lend Lease Act:

> It is the firm opinion of your committee, that taking into consideration existing world conditions, prompt enactment of H.R. 1776 into law is of the highest importance to the vital interests of our country—and even of our civilization.

The Senate vote on H.R. 1776, Mr. President, was only two votes over a three-fifths majority. The House vote was 260 to 165, one vote short of three-fifths majority.

I think many of us remember the one vote majority by which we instituted the draft shortly before World War II broke out.

There are too many such instances. We have the vote on the Contras which many of us think is vital, including the President of the United States. I am quite sure that it would not pass if it had to pass by a three-fifths majority. Only history will prove whether it was necessary or not. But the Constitution did not provide that we should permit ourselves tc be saddled with a three-fifths majority requirement in providing for the common defense.

I ask my colleague from Illinois, who kindly consented to permit enough time before he moved to table, and the floor manager on the other side, the Senator from South Carolina, whether they intend to move to table without relinquishing the floor. I want to know if this debate is going to be permitted to go on for a while.

Mr. SIMON. I was having a discussion with Senator THURMOND and I did not hear the question.

Mr. DENTON. I am asking Senator SIMON and Senator THURMOND if upon my yielding the floor they intend to move to table. If so, I do not wish to relinquish my right to the floor.

Mr. SIMON. We will move to table at that point unless someone else has something to add to the debate.

Mr. DENTON. Then I ask my senior colleague from Alabama, recognizing that his bill has a better chance to pass the way he has composed it and recognizing that he has certainly put in considerable thought and consultation with others—and the interests of his amendment may, indeed, exceed that which I am about to request of him—but I ask the Senator from Alabama, as I asked him several years ago, if he would consider that the imposition of the requirement for this Nation to be in armed conflict may not be the best way to go about this. Why require conflict if the need is that evident? For example, if missiles were on their way. We have some defensive missiles, but it is going to cost money for the electricity to push the button to get those missiles fired. Are we going to have to be in conflict to get that money? Will someone have to die? Do we have to have troops dying before we undo the budget by $5 for electricity?

I ask that with great respect because of the force of my sincerity on the issue, and not out of any lack of deep respect for the Senator's courage and wisdom in offering his amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. I reply, we worked on it. Last time I took the Senator's amendment, and at that time we did not have the word "conflict." In the 97th Congress we failed to get sufficient votes. I believe it was four votes short.

I had a great number of Senators and other people indicate to me that if we had provided for undeclared wars they would have supported it, and that the military conflict was a requirement.

I will be delighted to support the Senator in his efforts because I basically feel that there should be exceptions.

But I think from the viewpoint right now, I would like to keep them separate and would like to have a vote on a military conflict which involves some sustained activity.

There may be instances which might not require expenditure of money. We could have instances where the amendment might be misused. But we have tried to phrase this amendment in such a way to prevent its misuse. The language requires the United States to be engaged in military conflict which causes an imminent and serious military threat to the national security. That joint resolution must go to the President. It is signed. Then it comes back and we go through a second vote on the waiver. Bearing in mind the War Powers Act, I think that this is directed to situations where there is a sustained conflict that justifies the waiver of the constitutional amendment and the expenditure of additional funds.

I think we have these safeguards. I will support the Senator in his efforts. I think it would be desirable to do so.

But from a viewpoint of this amendment I would like to keep them separate and have this one voted on without the other aspect which does not involve military conflict.

Mr. DENTON. I thank my colleague.

Mr. President, I am giving consideration, if it suits my colleague from Alabama, to offering my amendment in the second degree and then, of course, he would get the first vote for tabling, or whatever, and without meaning to inconvenience my colleague, if he wished me not to do that, I would offer it independently.

Mr. President, I ask the Senator's view of that.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator wants to, I believe under the parliamentary procedure, if he files a second-degree amendment, and there is a motion to table, it tables both, we will not get a separate vote on it. We will be involved in a parliamentary thicket there.

I do not believe that the Senator is in a situation where he wants to do that. I would think that the better procedure is to let us go ahead and vote on this. My staff has worked with the Senator. I saw a day or so ago his language that he wanted and I was under the impression that he was going to make a separate amendment, in which I told my staff to tell the Senator's staff that we would support the Senator, and I do.

I believe the Senator's second-degree amendment will have the effect of causing us to lose. The motion to table the Heflin amendment takes down the Denton amendment without any separate vote on it.

Mr. DENTON. In that case, Mr. President, I will withhold offering my amendment in the second degree to my senior colleague's amendment, but I may offer an amendment, not necessarily in hopes that it pass but in the hope that perhaps two or three or four other Senators may come a little closer or that I may learn something more, because we are discussing a very important issue here. The Senator from Illinois said we could fight within the budget or prepare within the budget. That is fine, except that if something unexpected occurs on the part of the enemy in the way of a buildup or a threat, we will not have budgeted for that. We will not know ahead of time. We cannot dream that up.

So I think we have to do what we need to do with respect to the threat when and if it occurs, not according to our desire in advance.

But I will yield the floor and let the vote occur.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I thank the junior Senator from Alabama. I think it is better that we take his amendment up, if we need to take it up, separately, because I think his goes a little further.

I am not going to belabor the issue here, but I want to join my colleague from Illinois in saying that Senator HEFLIN's amendment is one of the best drawn amendments that I have seen, in all due respect to all those other fine amendments that are here or going to be here.

I have listened to the debate, both in my office and here, and I am just very reluctant to put this type of criteria of "imminent," to put that word and these phrasings actually into the amendment. I urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment or to table it, as the case may be.

I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator withhold?

Mr. SIMON. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to respond briefly. To the Arguments that the opponents to my amendment have made. I believe there have been two arguments. The one by Senator SIMON is that there is provisions for transfer of funds within the Defense Department. The Korean war lasted 3 years. The Vietnam war lasted 11 years. Those transfers might help in the first fiscal year, but afterward I do not think that is an answer.

Senator THURMOND's argument was that you will always get the three-fifths vote. And I said, "Well, you know, lawyers sometimes like to narrow the issues and tell a jury if you believe this, you vote one way, and if you believe that, you vote one way."

So it would appear to me if you would say, "All right, if you believe that you will always get a three-fifths vote, then you vote against the amendment. But if you believe that you will not in the future always get a three-fifths vote, then you vote for the amendment."

I say that is not the real issue here as we deal with national security. The issue is this: Is there a question in your mind that you will always get a three-fifths vote? If there is a question in your mind, then vote for the Heflin amendment, because the national security should not be subject to a question.

On the other hand, if there is no question in your mind that you will always get a three-fifths vote, then vote against the Heflin amendment. But if there remains in the back of your mind, as you consider your patriotism, any question whatsoever, then vote for the Heflin amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, there are no two Senators I have more regard for than the two distinguished Senators from Alabama. Both of them played leading roles in attempting to get up a constitutional amendment to balance the budget in the past; frankly, very important roles.

But we are talking about a constitutional amendment. We are talking about an amendment that treats everything on the budget across the board basically equally, except defense. Because, under section 2, it says:

> The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

Under those circumstances, this amendment becomes ineffective for that particular year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

Now, admittedly, we have not had many declarations of war; and, admittedly, probably because the Constitution has been ignored in times past.

But, you do not just have to have a three-fifths vote to be able to take care of the military. I suggest that if there is a genuine national state of emergency, I cannot imagine anybody in either body not doing everything they possibly can to vote to help our country. I do not think a three-fifths vote will be very difficult to get. The fact is, we do not face these circumstances very squarely sometimes. But I do not believe that that is going to be a problem and it highlights the issue like never before and it does so in a constitutional way.

Second, if we do not want to get a three-fifths vote, we can have a majority vote to help the military. All we have to do is raise the revenues to do so. And the American people are willing to do that when that is necessary. None of us want to be slaves, none of us want to lose our freedoms, none of us will fail to stand up for what is right for this country. If you cannot get a three-fifths vote, then certainly you are going to be able to get a majority vote in order to increase taxes or revenues in order to pay for the emergency.

So it is not like you have to have a three-fifths vote, which I believe will not be too difficult to get, if we have a genuine state of national emergency.

Now, I have to admit it would be wonderful if we could put a 20-page document in the Constutition—I suppose in the eyes of some—that just outlines every little contingency. I suppose, before this day is out, at least one Senator will bring an amendment to the floor to try to exclude Social Security, because he knows that that is something that everybody can get excited about. Nobody wants to undermine Social Security. Nobody wants it to ever fail. Everybody wants us to live up to it. But I am sure, before the end of this day, one of our colleagues will bring an amendment to the constitutional amendment to exclude Social Security from consideration of the constitutional amendment.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will my friend, the Senator from Utah, yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DECONCINI. From my recollection of the hearings on the constitutional amendment, when the administration testified, I do not recall—and please correct me if I am wrong—any indication from the administration in support of any additional needs for national security that are not already here. Am I correct?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator points out a very cogent point.

Mr. DECONCINI. I just think the record should show there is not any movement here by our military establishment now, to take nothing away from our good colleagues here from Alabama who have a little different opinion about our national security. I do not question their intent here. But I do not think that, from an executive point of view, that has ever been brought to the attention of the Judiciary Committee and what we have here is satisfactory with the administration.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator stated it very appropriately.

Neither do I take anything away from the intent of the two distinguished Senators. I respect what they are trying to do. But we are talking about a constitutional amendment, not a substitute.

The reason it is so difficult to pass a constitutional amendment is because the Founding Fathers wanted to make it that way, so we just do not have a readily amendable basic document in this land.

Mr. DENTON. Will the Senator yield for one comment?

Mr. HATCH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DENTON. I did call, through such channels as I could avail myself of, this morning, after many calls from my staff, according to them, during the past 4 or 5 working days. I did not get an endorsement, nor did I get a denial, a disagreement with this from anyone in the administration. They did not give me a position.

But to say "the Military Establishment" is to beg the question. I do not know what the Military Establishment would think, but I imagine they would be very much in favor of what I am proposing.

Mr. DECONCINI. If the Senator will yield, in my reference to the Military Establishment, I meant the Defense Department, from the Secretary on down, did not testify in support of anything other than what is here. I did not mean to say all the military out there would support it, because I have no way of knowing.

Mr. DENTON. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, I see in what he has said—I ask his deference to make this comment—with regard to a majority to pass the appropriations necessary, my fear, as I have expressed in previous debates, is that somebody is going to come up with something about Social Security or another nondefense issue when Congress is attempting to pass the necessary defense appropriations—I have never seen an appropriations process that was very prompt. And a response to a defense need could be one requiring promptness, and therein lies my reservation about that.

Mr. HATCH. Well, if there was a serious military threat to national security, I have no doubt in my mind that the Congress will act one way or the other. You either have to have a three-fifths vote which everything else in the budget has to have—it is only fair to treat everything in the budget the same way—or you can increase revenues through a majority vote. It is not like you do not have a majority vote or you do not have any possibility of doing anything by majority vote.

I agree, a balanced budget may not always be appropriate. That is the purpose of both the wartime waiver in section 2, as well as the three-fifths exemption in section 1.

I do not see the purpose, however, in adding another exception whether it is the form of "national emergency," "imminent threat to national security," or because of high levels of unemployment. If any of these circumstances genuinely warrant the deficit, I would think a three-fifths vote would not prevent an insuperable obstacle. If it did, it would suggest that the national emergency was not as well accepted as some may have suggested. In other words, the present language of Senate Joint Resolution 225 contains an exception for each of these circumstances. It simply defines the emergency, or threat to security, or whatever, by a three-fifths vote of Congress, by a majority vote, to increase revenues or we could set up a contingency fund to take care of these problems which is probably one of the best things we could do.

I further remind my colleagues that, even if a deficit were unavailable for some important spending program, the present amendment would allow taxes to be increased to pay for such a program by a majority vote. I made that point over and over.

The major problem again that I personally have with the amendment is one of definition. I believe that it would seriously undermine this constitutional amendment to place in it a general term of exception that could be employed virtually without standings. That is the last way in my opinion to impose a genuine restraint upon Congress.

I believe that the present amendment addresses this issue properly. If three-fifths of the Members of Congress are not persuaded that some unusual circumstance requires the budget deficit then it shall be permissible. Otherwise, I am comfortable with the present terms of the amendment being imposed upon Congress. There is a difference in my view between recognizing that an amendment of this sort has to be flexible and between writing in a loophole that virtually consumes the general rule of the amendment.

I would also make note of the fact that this country has lived under the terms of one national emergency after another for most of the post-World War II period.

I believe, for example, that the national emergency represented by the Korean war lasted nearly a decade after the so-called antivet war.

This amendment poses a difficult question. What kind of military emergency does this intend to cover which would not be perceived by the Congress or any Member of Congress as sufficiently threatening to invoke three-fifths waiver in section 1? If we are at war, section 2 waives the provisions for a balanced budget. If we are in a serious emergency, three-fifths of Congress will certainly perceive the threat.

What kind of crisis then falls between these two categories that this amendment intends to cover? Does it include Grenada, or the Lebanese Marine barracks disaster, or the unrest in the Philippines or Nicaragua? If so, such crises are underway nearly every day of every year.

What we do not want is to have those who are enemies of balanced budgets using this as an excuse and as a loophole to be able to unbalance the budget anytime they want to, and have business as usual, which is what we have had for 26 of the last 27 years during which time we failed to balance the budget of this country.

This amendment has been carefully written and carefully drafted. It is a consensus amendment, bipartisan amendment, and I can tell you that the White House supports it as it is, and the Office of Management and Budget supports it as it is. They do not want changes. They do it because it is bipartisan, because it does have a consensus, because there have been just thousands and thousands of hours put into trying to bring together the coalition that makes this amendment possible to even come to the floor.

Mr. DENTON. Will the Senator kindly yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, it seems that the deficit is being laid at the feet of the defense spending for meeting emergencies.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will yield, that is not the case—not from this Senator. I am saying that I realize under John F. Kennedy 50 percent of the budget went for the military. When Reagan became President, we were down to 23 percent. Now it is up to 26 percent. If he gets what he wants this year, it might go to 28. But that is still 20 percentage points less.

Mr. DENTON. As the Senator knows, the spending program has gone up like that.

Mr. HATCH. The defense spending has gone way up while military has gone way down. But still that does not justify, other than the section we have provided, treating the military any differently from anybody else on this budget. It does not justify having an exception for Social Security. There are savings that can be made there as well, and still give justice to the poor, the weak, and the elderly who need the help of Social Security.

We should have everything in the budget looked at pursuant to this amendment, and nothing should really be excepted including the military. There are enough flexible ways of getting around this problem within this amendment that we do not need to add another amendment to allow anybody to raise this issue anytime they want to, to make the balanced budget amendment once it is adopted into the Constitution basically a nonentity.

Mr. DENTON, One other question. The Senator understands that my reservation is not based upon the logic of what he is saying. It has to do with the timing. I could not foresee the probability that an agreement about an appropriations bill with all that normally goes into that will necessarily be as speedy as it should be to permit the expenditure of money.

Mr. HATCH. As the Senator knows, we do not need an appropriations bill. We could have a joint resolution between both Houses of Congress passed in 5 minutes in each body.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator form Washington is recognized.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, the concern which the two distinguished Senators from Alabama expressed, which is evident in this amendment to the proposed constitutional amendment, is one which is very difficult for this Senator who is an opponent of the entire idea of amending the Constitution to deal with.

I am slightly inclined to vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the two distinguished Senators from Alabama. But I believe they would be better advised to deal with this concern by opposing the entire proposition that the Constitution of the United States should be amended in this fashion. I say that starting my argument by reading the Preamble to the Constitution of the United States. It reads:

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

The Senators from Alabama feel that one of those purposes, "to provide for the common defense," should be an exception to this proposal to include a certain fiscal policy in the Constitution of the United States; that even in the absence of a declaration of war, providing for the common defense should not be subject to the supermajority which is at the heart of this constitutional amendment. Evidently, however, the importance of providing for the establishment of justice, the insurance of domestic tranquility, the promotion of the general welfare and securing the blessings of liberty are not so important as is providing for the common defense. And, therefore, moneys for those purposes, a perfect union, justice, tranquility, general welfare can appropriately be subjected to this greater fiscal discipline.

I believe that the correct answer to the dilemma facing the two Senators from Alabama is not somehow or another to prefer one of the purposes of the Constitution to all other purposes of the Constitution, but simply not to pass a new element to the Constitution on this subject at all.

Last Friday I stated that my extended debate over this subject with the distinguished Senator from Utah in 1982 marked one of the high points of my career in the U.S. Senate. I have since looked back at the notes of that debate and, of course, I am first struck by the fact that the amendment to the Constitution of the United States for this purpose proposed in 1982 was somewhat different from the version which is proposed here in 1986. That in and of itself may illustrate the fact that the Constitution is not the place with which to deal with problems of fiscal policy.

Some of the criticisms which I directed at that proposal are no longer relevant, though others have taken their place.

A summary of my own argument in 1982, however, Mr. President, was that it was clearly premature to deal with these fiscal questions—with the demand for a balanced budget—in the form of a constitutional amendment rather than in the form of a statute; that we should first see whether or not this goal could be reached statutorily before we seriously considered changing the fundamental law of our land.

Since 1982, of course, we have done just that. Last November we passed the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Balanced Budget Act of 1985. We passed it only after extended debate; only after a multitude of changes were made in the original form of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and only after we had set out in detail, in detail which occupies in excess of 100 pages, the exact way in which we were to approach a balanced budget over a 5-year period.

And yet, at the beginning of a debate over the first budget resolution, which is subject to the provisions of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, we are again on the floor attempting to place something like the policy included in that bill into the Constitution of the United States.

If it was even remotely premature to deal with the issue as a constitutional amendment in 1982, it is clearly so in 1986.

There will be one of two results of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I hope and I believe, as a result of that intelligent statutory approach to this challenge, it will be that we will in fact balance the budget by 1991 because of the intense discipline which it imposes on our fiscal maintaining debates and because of the incentives it gives to the Members of the Congress to operate responsibly.

If I am correct, if Gramm-Rudman-Hollings works, it is clear we do not need a constitutional amendment on the subject at all; that we in fact can meet these responsibilities at least under present circumstances through the form of a statute. Certainly, we should always abide by the proposition that we should solve a problem in the least intrusive possible fashion. If a problem can be adequately solved through regulation, it should be solved through regulation. If it requires a statute, we should pass a statute. But only if no other method avails should we even consider changing the Constitution of the United States.

The second alternative, of course, is that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will fail. Well, if it does, why will it fail? I submit, Mr. President, it will fail if, and only if, the people of the United States decide that a balanced budget is not a particularly high priority; that what they have seen in the last few years as being vitally important is not as important as many other priorities which the people of the United States have.

It is in that respect, of course, Mr. President, that I think that this whole approach is most greatly flawed.

The proponents of this constitutional amendment purport to decide not only for this Congress and, for that matter, for Congresses through 1991, what a valid fiscal policy for the United States should be; they purport to make that decision for the year 2000, for the year 2010, for the year 2050, and for the tricentennial of the United States in the year 2076.

I submit, Mr. President, that none of us can see that far in the future. To make decisions of this nature and to enshrine them in the Constitution, in my view, Mr. President, is the height of arrogance. We have enough problems facing us today which we need to solve without attempting to set fiscal policies for the next century.

Second, Mr. President, it seems clear to me, as it did in 1982, that this amendment is flawed from the point of view of the method by which it will operate. I had an interesting discussion with the distinguished Senators from Illinois and Utah on last Friday on that subject.

I submit more firmly than ever that the phrases "receipts" and "outlays" are words of art and even the authors of this constitutional amendment cannot anticipate how they will be interpreted in the future.

The distiguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI] proposes a one-word addition to this constitutional amendment by putting the word "total" in the phrase "receipts and outlays," as if that would make the term more precise.

There is no way in the world that that will make it more precise or that it can be made more precise.

What, for example, Mr. President, do the sponsors say to the proposition that in order to get around some of the strictures of this proposal the Congress might sell the space shuttle or a courthouse or a national forest and lease it back for use by the United States? Presumably the receipts from that sale would be receipts and only the lease payments outlays. So we would be borrowing against the future with as great a reality under those circumstances as we do at the present time when we call borrowing borrowing.

The imaginations of our predecessors and of our contemporaries here certainly will not exceed the fertility of the imaginations of our successors in finding ways around this constitutional amendment when it appears imperative for them to do so.

We simply are faced with a situtation, Mr. President, in which we should let well enough alone. This Congress has done an outstanding job in the passage of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. We have at least started down the road toward a balanced budget and toward fiscal responsibility. We should not enshrine that kind of policy in the Constitution of the United States at the very least until we learn what the consequences of following that roadway to its ultimate goal are, in fact.

The distinguished Senator from Utah has assured me this year, as he did in 1982, that the interference by the courts of the United States in the fiscal process resulting from this constitutional amendment would be infrequent and minimal.

I wish I could accept that assurance of the distinguished Senator from Utah. I have few examples, if any, of instances in which the courts of the United States have been asked to interpret the Constitution in which their interferences have been few and have been minimal. I submit that that interference will be frequent and intrusive; that the losing side on every vote on fiscal policy in the Congresses of the future will, as did the opponents of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, immediately adjourn across the street to the closest U.S. district court and challenge their majoritarian colleagues for having violated this constitutional provision.

Finally, Mr. President, somewhat unlike the proposal in 1982, this constitutional amendment seems to me to fly under a false flag. It is not really a balanced budget amendment at all. It is a supermajority amendment. The Senator from Utah went to great pains to point out to the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama just a few moments ago how easy it will be to unbalance the budget pursuant to this amendment when we are faced with a national security emergency. It will be almost automatic, he said. It would take 5 minutes to pass a joint resolution through the two Houses of Congress.

In that respect, I am convinced that the Senator from Utah is absolutely and totally correct. All we have done is to distort the relationship between spending and taxes by requiring certain spending decisions to require a three-fifths vote and certain taxing decisions to require only a constitutional majority vote.

What we will do, should we pass this constitutional amendment, is to put an immensely potent weapon into the hands of a handful of Members of this body and of the House of Representatives—9 Senators, in fact, since it takes 51 to have a majority at the present time in the Senate and would require 60 to unbalance the budget pursuant to this amendment.

Do not think that those last nine votes, when a majority desires to unbalance the budget, are not going to have a tremendous amount of leverage and a tremendous amount of trading stock. Do not think when the budget becomes unbalanced pursuant to this proposed rule that it is not going to be much worse than it is right now, because each of those nine Senators will demand his or her pound of flesh, his or her appropriation, his or her share of that unbalanced budget.

I submit, Mr. President, that the ultimate impact of passing this kind of constitutional amendment may be to make our budgets unbalanced by a greater degree than they are at the present time rather than a lesser degree, because more people will have to come together, more Members will have to be satisfied before such a measure can in effect be passed.

It seems to me in summary, Mr. President, that this proposal is very bad policy, that it will not succeed in reaching its goal nearly as well as Gramm-Rudman-Hollings can, and that the amendment proposed by the two Senators from Alabama illustrates just exactly what the problem is. They fear that it may be too difficult, pursuant to this constitutional amendment, to provide for the common defense of the people of the United States. They may be right. But if it is, it is then too difficult to provide for the general welfare of the people of the United States or to insure the domestic tranquility of the people of the United States, or to engage in any of the other purposes of the Constitution.

On the other hand, if the Senator from Utah is right, it will not be difficult at all to deal with the common defense, even though it requires a three-fifths majority and, by the same token, it will not be difficult to unbalance the budget for other purposes, either.

Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator DENTON be added as a cosponsor to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have just one brief remark to the distinguished senior Senator from Washington [Mr. GORTON]. I think he points out the other aspects of the preamble of the Constitution—to establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, promote the general welfare, secure the blessings of liberty. None of those can be accomplished under our democratic form of government unless we defend the Nation against our enemies. Therefore, I think that providing for the common defense has priority.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, again I commend the able Senators from Alabama for their dedication, their patriotism, and for all they are doing to try to keep the country with a strong defense. I do want to say this: We spend about $300 billion a year to keep a strong defense and this is sufficient to allow us to respond to any initial emergency, an initial emergency up to 60 days. We have time then to provide more funds. Never in the history of this country that I know of has Congress ever failed to provide funds in case of an emergency, in case of conflict, in case of war. I just do not think any Congress will in the future. If we are in a conflict, there is no question in my mind that Congress will provide the funds.

That is what we spend all this money for now, to keep this country prepared and we take care of any initial assault that may come and respond to it and we will have time to do it.

The funds can be provided then, if necessary, by a majority of the Congress. They can provide more funds.

We do not think this amendment is necessary, we think it will encumber the Constitution. It is a lot of words that are not necessary here. We have a simple, straightforward amendment that we think ought to be adopted. That is the reason we oppose this amendment.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I renew my motion to lay the amendment on the table. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Alabama on the table. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRASSLEY). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

COCAINE—ITS IMPACT ON OUR CHILDREN AND CRIME

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, the cover story of the current issue of Newsweek magazine is devoted to "Kids and Cocaine" and reveals to a public that at times seems apathetic and indifferent "the plain fact is that cocaine abuse is the fastest growing drug problem in America for adults and school-age children alike." To make matters worse, cocaine is now being sold and used in an "especially destructive new form" known on the street as "crack" or "rock." Crack is smoked and the resulting intoxication is, according to the Newsweek research, "far more intense than snorted cocaine—much quicker, much more euphoric, and much, much more addictive." A specialist at Fair Oaks Hospital in Summit, NJ, Arnold Washton, is quoted as follows:

> Crack is almost instantaneous addiction, whereas if you snort coke it can take 2 to 5 years before addiction sets in. There is no such thing as the recreational use of crack. It is the most addictive drug known to man right now.

The implications of this new drug technique to public health, society, law enforcement, and the economy are menacing. The impact on the economy from drugs already is disastrous. When I first addressed the subject of "Drugs and Productivity" on the Senate floor on July 29, 1983 and "Drugs in the Workplace" on September 21, 1983, a study by the Research Triangle Institute of North Carolina indicated that the cost of drug abuse to the American economy was nearly $26 billion, including $16.6 billion in lost productivity alone. In a study released by Research Triangle in 1984 the total had risen to $47 billion.

Whatever the crime statistics are in a given year—whether they are up or down in certain categories—there is an undeniable link between crime and drug addiction. An addict uses all the resources he or she can muster legitimately, then turns to crime as a means of financing a costly drug habit. It is also a well-documented fact that people under the influence of drugs tend to relax their moral and ethical standards. That leads them down the road to temptations and criminal behavior that in the normal course of events might not be encountered.

Sociologists point out another causal relationship between criminal behavior and drugs. Drugs are part of a contemporary, trendy lifestyle which sometimes leads to crime, and in which the commission of a crime itself is a tremendous high.

Studies of drug use and its relationship to crime reveal some interesting things. One study of Federal prisoners disclosed that one-third of them were drug addicts. Up to 40 percent reported using heroin prior to imprisonment, and an even larger percentage reported using other illicit drugs. In a study conducted at a New York drug center, involving 38 people, every person had committed criminal acts. Twenty-six addicts were responsible, on a daily basis, for 22 crimes. In a California prison, regular users of heroin admitted they had committed an average of 177 property crimes a year, compared with an average of just over 20 for nondrug offenders. In Michigan, daily heroin users committed 103 property crimes a year, versus 41 for nondrug offenders. In Texas, addicts admitted 180 property crimes, versus 23 for nondrug offenders.

The contrasting rates for theft further strengthen the evidence of a link between drug use and crime. In Texas, crimes of theft ran 15 times higher among drug users than nonusers. In Michigan, theft crimes were 4 times higher, and 10 times higher in California, among offenders with a drug habit than among persons who were drug free.

If there is still doubt, let me cite the findings of one more study, conducted by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, involving 243 Baltimore addicts. They averaged 248 days of crime a year for the entire group. Nearly 10 percent of the group committed one or more crimes every single day of the year. Over a 2-year period, these 243 heroin addicts committed over 500,000 crimes.

We have noted crime against property, which involves breaking and entering, auto theft, arson, forgery, counterfeiting, passing worthless checks, misuse of credit cards, buying and selling stolen property, and vandalism. And we have talked about theft, ranging from armed robbery to purse snatching and confidence games. But what of other kinds of criminal behavior: homicide, manslaughter, rape, assault, and child molestation? What of prostitution and pornography, of offenses against the family, violence, disorderly conduct, and vagrancy?

What of monetary costs to society beyond what the victims of crime suffer directly? The cost of drug-related crime is more than $5 billion a year for courts, police, and prisons. More than $1.6 billion is spent annually on alarm systems, locks, and other protective measures. Property valued at more than $110 million is destroyed or damaged during criminal acts.

There is no way to fix the cost in human terms to families whose lives are disrupted by drug addiction. Invasion of a home by drug-crazed strangers must be one of the most frightening of human encounters. The addiction of a family member who first mistreats and brutalizes his loved ones, denies them of essentials in order to feed his habit, and then turns to crime for money to buy drugs, is a shattering experience.

The Nation's youth, ever eager to chalk up new experiences and sample the fruits of life, are especially vulnerable. They experiment with drugs because of one simple fact: the drugs are there. It's a logical extension of why the explorer climbs the mountain: because it is there. Beyond experimentation, there is addiction. Beyond addiction, there is crime. There can be no serious doubt about a cause/effect relationship between crime and drugs. They go hand in hand. To make a serious reduction in the incidence of crime, we must first deal striking blows to the international drug traffic and we must take whatever steps are necessary to reduce the attraction of our citizenry, both the young and the mature, to drugs.

President Nixon, in his message to Congress on June 17, 1971, stated that the drug abuse problem in the United States has reached the dimension of "a national emergency." I regret to say that the description is just as accurate today as it was when Mr. Nixon used it 15 years ago. In fact, the situation is much worse.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that stories on drugs and children, from Newsweek magazine, and on drugs in the workplace, from Time magazine, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the stories were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Time, Mar. 17, 1986]

BATTLING THE ENEMY WITHIN

The night shift at the General Motors plant in Wentzville, Mo., was busy putting together Buick Park Avenues and Oldsmobile Regency 98s when ten policemen quietly entered the factory. Making their way along the assembly line, the offices clapped handcuffs on twelve workers. They had allegedly sold cocaine, hashish, marijuana and LSD with an estimated street value of $250,000 to two young undercover agents who had been hired by GM to pose as assembly-line workers.

Alarmed by reports of widespread drug and alcohol use at its Laughlin, Nev., generating station, the Southern California Edison Co. organized its own raid. Corporate managers and security officers cut the personal padlocks off 400 employee lockers to rummage through the contents. They searched cars in the parking lot and even frisked a few workers. Seven employees were fired for possessing drugs or alcohol at work in violation of company rules.

Twenty Unocal employees were startled when company cars and vans converged on their remote oil-pumping station in Piru, Calif., and discharged a cordon of private security officers and drug-sniffing dogs to search the grounds. No drugs were found, but six workers were later suspended when urine tests demanded by the company showed traces of marijuana. The six were reinstated only after they agreed to submit to urinalysis regularly in the future.

In the old days, an oilworker might have decked his boss for asking him to supply a urine sample, and workplace raids by company vigilantes, let alone police, would have been unthinkable. But in the old days, it was rare for someone to come to work stoned on drugs or for managers to have to worry about cokeheads in the office. Not anymore, and not just in isolated instances either. Illegal drugs have become so pervasive in the U.S. workplace that they are used in almost every industry, the daily companions of blue- and white-collar workers alike. Their presence on the job is sapping the energy, honesty and reliability of the American labor force even as competition from foreign companies is growing ever tougher.

Now U.S. employers have decided to strike back at the drug plague. In high-rise office towers and sprawling factory complexes, in bustling retail stores and remote warehouses, companies are cracking down on workers who get high on the job. Supervisors are watching closely for tell-tale signs and confronting workers who seem impaired. Employees caught with drugs are often fired on the spot, and suspected users are urged to enter rehabilitation clinics. Hundreds of companies are setting up programs to combat drugs, providing psychiatric counseling for employees, resorting to urinalysis to identify users, and in a few cases going so far as to install hidden video cameras or hire undercover agents.

A measure of the inroads drugs have made on the U.S. workplace came last week when the President's Commission on Organized Crime took the extraordinary step of asking all U.S. companies to test their employees for drug use. In an initial report based on a 32-month study, the commission also urged the Government not only to test its own workers but to withhold federal contracts from private firms that refuse to do the same. "Drug trafficking is the most serious organized-crime problem in the world today," said the commission, which argued that the Government and private companies can play a vital role in curbing demand for drugs.

The recommendations immediately stirred a fire storm of controversy. Said Representative Peter Rodino, a New Jersey Democrat who chairs the House Judiciary Committee: "Wholesale testing is unwarranted and raises serious civil liberty concerns." Agreed Democratic Representative Charles Schumer of New York: "Trying to stop organized crime's multimillion-dollar drug business by creating a police state in federal office buildings would be virtually ineffective and would create one crime to stop another."

But many business leaders have concluded that the threat posed by drugs on the job can be answered only with tough measures. Dr. Michael Walsh, chief of clinical and behavioral pharmacology at the National Institute on Drug Abuse, notes that the number of corporations that ask him for advice on how to get drugs out of the workplace has increased dramatically in the past few months. Says he: "The momentum is very, very strong at this point."

And with good reason. The costs of drug abuse on the job are staggering. The consequences range from accidents and injuries to theft, bad decisions and ruined lives. According to the Research Triangle Institute, a respected North Carolina business-sponsored research organization, drug abuse cost the U.S. economy $60 billion in 1983, or nearly 30% more than the $47 billion estimated for 1980. Other studies have found that employees who use drugs are far less productive than their co-workers and miss ten or more times as many workdays. Drug abusers are three times as likely as nonusers to injure themselves or someone else. Moreover, addicts with expensive habits are much more likely to steal cash from a company safe, products from a warehouse or equipment from a factory.

Concern is greatest, of course, in industries where mistakes can cost lives. Since 1975, about 50 train accidents have been attributed to drug- or alcohol-impaired workers. In those mishaps, 37 people were killed, 80 were injured, and more than $34 million worth of property was destroyed. In 1979, for instance, a Conrail employee was high on marijuana at the controls of a locomotive when he missed a stop signal and crashed into the rear of another train at Royersford, Pa. The accident killed two people and caused damages amounting to $467,500.

In the airline industry, the code of pride and honor that has kept most pilots and air-traffic controllers sober over the years may be seriously eroding. In September 1984 a pilot for a major international airline called 800-COCAINE, a New Jersey-based hot line that provides treatment referral and information. He said that he had been up for three days straight snorting cocaine and that he was scheduled to fly a passenger jet to Europe that night. He was feeling exhausted and paranoid, he confided, but was sure he could stay awake and alert if he just kept taking drugs. "Call in sick and get some sleep," urged the hot-line counselor. The counselor, who never found out what the pilot finally decided to do, says that such calls are not unusual.

The National Transportation Safety Board attributed a fatal 1983 air accident to illegal drug abuse. Two crewmen died when a cargo flight crash-landed at Newark airport. Autopsies showed that the pilot had been smoking marijuana, possibly while flying. In an incident last March, a New York-based air-traffic controller who had been injecting three grams of cocaine daily at work put a DC-10 jumbo jet on a collision course with a private plane. At the last moment, the smaller aircraft made an emergency landing.

Even the space program has not been immune to the drug plague. Dr. Howard Frankel, who was medical director of Rockwell's space shuttle division from 1981 until 1983, says that he treated employees who were hallucinating on the job, collapsing from cocaine overdoses and using marijuana, PCP, heroin and numerous other drugs while they worked. Frankel estimates that 20% to 25% of the Rockwell workers at the Palmdale, Calif., plant, the final assembly point for the four space shuttles, were high on the job from drugs, alcohol or both. During the construction of the spacecraft, police raided Rockwell's shuttle assembly plant in Downey, Calif., several times after undercover agents bought cocaine, heroin, methamphetamines and marijuana from employees. Nine workers were fired.

No evidence suggests that Rockwell's drug situation had any thing to do with the Challenger tragedy. The solid rocket booster that is suspected of causing the explosion was made by Chicago-based Morton Thiokol, and no reports of drug use among its employees have surfaced. Nonetheless, any drug abuse among production workers in the space program or the defense industry carries grave risks. Says Frankel: "In this kind of ultra-high-tech work, the guy who makes the little adjustments, the screwer-on of parts, the bolter of nuts, is just as important as the project's chief engineer."

Besides fearing that stoned employees may do shoddy work on missiles and planes, defense industry executives are concerned about security. They fear that addicts on the payroll might sell defense secrets to support their habits. Moreover, because criminal narcotics-possession charges could lead to the loss of security clearances necessary for many jobs in the defense industry, drug abusers are extremely vulnerable to blackmail. Says R. Richard Heppe, the president of Lockheed California: "We do a lot of highly classified work here, and people with these problems are much higher security risks."

No one knows precisely how pervasive drug use on the job is. But there is no doubt that during the past couple of decades, illegal drugs have become deeply ingrained in American life. Federal experts estimate that between 10% and 23% of all U.S. workers use dangerous drugs on the job. Other research indicates that people who take drugs regularly, some 25% of the population according to Government calculations, are likely to use them at work or at least sometimes be on a high when they arrive at the workplace. In a 1985 study conducted by the 800-COCAINE counselors, 75% of those calling the hot line reported that they sometimes took coke while on the job, and 69% said they regularly worked under the influence of cocaine. One-fourth said they used cocaine at work every day.

Marijuana was once the most common drug in the workplace, but cocaine may now have become No. 1. According to estimates by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, the number of Americans who take marijuana at least occasionally declined between 1979 and 1982, the most recent years for which statistics are available, from 22 million to 20 million. During the same period, the ranks of cocaine users increased from 15 million to 22 million. The problem seems to be most prevalent among young adults. NIDA estimated last week that nearly two-thirds of the people now entering the work force have used illegal drugs and 44% have taken them during the past year.

Cocaine is an increasingly popular drug to use at work, partly because the intense high it generates often gives users the false feeling that they can do their jobs better and faster. Moreover, cocaine is easy to hide. It is generally snorted rather than smoked, and does not give off an odor as marijuana does. Users have devised ingenious ways of taking the drug right in front of their coworkers without being detected. Some, for example, buy squeeze-bottle medications for sinus congestion, empty out the medicine and refill the bottles with cocaine. Cocaine vaporizes at temperatures above 80°, so merely carrying it in a pocket keeps the container close to normal body temperature of 98.6° and the coke ready for sniffing.

In many offices, drugs are as easy to obtain as paper clips from the stock room. Some dealers provide messenger services to deliver cocaine and marijuana right to their customers' desks. In other cases, users send unwitting company messengers on "business" errands to pick up packages that actually contain narcotics.

Dangerous drugs can be found at every level of industry, from the shop floor to the executive suite. Says Naomi Behrman, a counselor for AT&T/Bell Labs: "You can no longer assume that because a person wears a three-piece suit and a necktie, you can rule out drug abuse."

In fact, many managers are in an excellent position to hide drug habits because they can close their office doors and delegate work to others. Company officers also travel frequently, making it easier to use narcotics on the sly. Chief executives who order up internal investigations of drug problems are often shocked when the trail leads to some of their most trusted aides. Says Special Agent George Miller of the Drug Enforcement Administration "Companies never think of drug use on the executive level. They always think it's on the assembly line."

Sometimes the chief is the culprit. Chairman Terence Fox of Iroquois Brands, the Greenwich, Conn.-based maker of Champale malt liquor, was arrested in November after being discovered in a hotel room with $8,000 worth of cocaine. Last year Miller Brewing filed a $19 million civil suit against Robert Landau Associates, a New York City sports-promotion firm that had gone into bankruptcy proceedings in 1984. The brewer, a former client of Landau Associates, charged that President Robert Landau spent $2 million of Miller's promotional money on cocaine, racehorses and other personal expenses. Landau has denied the allegations.

Though drug abuse is most likely to make the headlines when it involves Hollywood celebrities and sports stars, the problem is also epidemic among doctors, lawyers and other professionals in high-pressure, fast-paced work environments. In the high-tech firms of California's Silicon Valley, sudden wealth has created a thirst for instant gratification and expensive highs. One former employee at a computer company tells of being the office cocaine pusher for three years. Says he: "It was made to order. I had an instant clientele—hundreds of people who worked with me."

In the heady bull markets of the past two years, more than a few hot young brokers on Wall Street have stoked up on drugs for frenetic trading sessions. Steve, a stockbroker and recovering addict, snorted cocaine in his office, in men's rooms, even in elevators. "It woke me up and gave me strength," he recalls. "It made me feel like J.P. Morgan.

Up and down Madison Avenue, cocaine has become almost a currency in advertising agencies. Coke for models, photographers and artists is buried in budgets. Copywriters use cocaine to jump-start their creative juices. Independent producers supply it to the agency representatives on location. In a survey of 300 advertising directors conducted by Advertising Age magazine in August, 45 reported cases in which cocaine had been used as under-the-counter compensation. Sometimes, ad agency employees hire production companies to make commercials only if the firms offer bribes of cocaine.

But drug abuse is not just a by-product of life in the fast lane. Drugs are also used by multitudes of blue-collar workers to relieve the deadening boredom of menial jobs. Says Miriam Ingebritson, clinical director for a St. Louis-based consulting firm that provides drug-therapy services for IBM, the Cincinnati Reds and the City of St. Louis: "Frequently we find that it is not the exhilarating high that people are looking for, but rather to escape from tedium."

GM, Ford and other manufacturers with large blue-collar work forces have discovered that drug dealers offer virtually an alternative cafeteria service in their plants. Instead of meat loaf, marcaroni and apple pie, the choices are marijuana, hashish, cocaine and amphetamines. For Cherry Electrical Products, a semiconductor and electrical-equipment manufacturer near Chicago, the seamy side of company life came to light in October 1984, when two employees were arrested late one evening for selling marijuana to an undercover policeman. President Peter Cherry peddled in the company's stock room. One woman employee with an unmanageably expensive habit had allegedly become a parking-lot prostitute during breaks. Within three weeks, 20 workers who were accused of taking or selling drugs quit or were fired. Says Cherry: "it was like Pandora's box was opened. We were stunned."

Some workers get so freaked out on drugs that they become a menace to everyone around them. A meter reader for Washington utility became crazed after taking PCP and ran from one backyard to another. He hid behind bushes and jumped out and screamed at frightened neighborhood residents until police arrested him. In New Jersey a dentist who injected himself with three syringes of cocaine every morning as he drove down the turnpike to work began to complain that the fillings he was putting into patients' mouths were talking to him. His partners quickly forced the dentist to sell his share of the practice.

Many professionals have ridden their drug habits to bankruptcy and homelessness. Bob, a Wall Street trader, was so hooked on cocaine that he lost his job and wound up eating out of garbage cans and living on the streets. David, an attorney in New Jersey, spent $60,000 on cocaine in 1983 and frequently free-based cocaine in his office. Fearing that invisible people were watching him at all hours, he nailed shut the windows in his house and covered them with sheets, but still believed they were coming through the walls. Both men now regularly attend meetings of Cocaine Anonymous, a national self-help group patterned on the principles of Alcoholics Anonymous. While David is back on the job, many of the people he used to get high with were not so fortunate. Says he: "A lot of my old friends are dead."

Until recently, many companies have been slow to respond to their growing drug dilemmas. They did not realize how widespread the abuse was and had no idea how to combat it. Managers were not sure how to recognize the signs of drug use and were often afraid to confront workers who appeared to be high. Many executives doubted that the problem was serious enough to warrant a crackdown that might generate bad publicity.

But the smoking, snorting and dealing on the job eventually became so blatant and the results so tragic that companies could not longer afford to ignore what was going on. New York-based Capital Cities/ABC woke up to its drug troubles in 1984 after an employee collapsed at work, and subsequently died, from a cocaine overdose. Shortly thereafter, Capital Cities, which later acquired ABC, discovered organized drug dealing in one of its divisions. Last year, according to Dr. Robert Wick, corporate medical director for American Airlines, a computer operator who was high on marijuana failed to load a crucial tape into a major airline's computer reservations system. Result: the system was out of service for some eight hours, costing the company about $19 million. Says Wick: "That was an awfully expensive joint by anybody's standards."

Such revelations have broken down corporate resistance to taking a strong stand against drugs. Psychiatrist Robert DuPont, a former director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse who now helps companies set up antidrug programs, says that employers "have gone through a mental barrier that was blocking them before. What was that barrier? The barrier was that it was a private matter. The barrier was that it was not very important. The barrier was that there was not anything to be done about it anyhow. The barrier was that it was a societal problem and not a work-related problem. There was a whole series of barriers that kept the companies from moving, and they are all falling down."

Employees attitudes toward drugs are slowly changing as well. Workers have long been reluctant to turn in their colleagues for drug use. They have been afraid of ruining their co-workers' careers and of being ostracized for snitching. In addition, they could not be sure that management would believe them or back them up. But more and more employees are becoming fed up with working alongside people who are stoned. Says a news correspondent for a major New York City TV station: "After all, you work for days sometimes to make a story the best you can and then some drug-abusing idiot pushes the wrong button when you're on the air. Why should I put up with that?"

Once companies acknowledge and confront the drug threat, their first task is to establish a consistent policy that is both firm and fair. Typically, companies decide to dismiss workers caught taking or selling drugs on the job but also offer a helping hand to users who voluntarily admit their problem.

To help put impaired workers on the road to rehabilitation, about 30% of the Fortune 500 largest industrial corporations have established in-house employee-assistance programs, commonly known as EAPs. Many of these programs were set up during the 1970s for workers suffering from alcoholism, and have since been expanded to include drug abusers. The motivation behind the EAPs has been economic as well as humanitarian. Says Drug Consultant Ingebritson: "It's much easier to help a person who has been on the job for nine years than it is to hire and train someone to replace him."

Mobil's drug-treatment program is fairly typical. Employees with a problem can call or stop by the medical departments at any of the oil company's facilities around the world. Supervisors who spot unusual behavior that is affecting job performance can encourage workers to contact an employee-assistance counselor. After initial medical examinations and counseling sessions, patients are generally referred to a hospital or outpatient drug clinic for treatment, which may take from four to six weeks. During that period the employees are given sick leave with pay, and their status is kept confidential. Company health-insurance benefits pay all the treatment costs. Once employees return to the job, they are allowed to attend follow-up counseling sessions during work hours. Says Dr. Joseph M. Cannella, Mobil's medical director: "We like to identify people, get them treated and back to work." He claims that Mobil's rehabilitation efforts have been 70% to 75% successful.

Many companies, including Capital Cities/ABC, Xerox and Dean Witter, have made it easier for employees to seek help by setting up nationwide hot lines with toll-free 800 numbers that workers and their families can call to get advice on drug problems. The service offers a guarantee of privacy to employees who are reluctant to approach their bosses or stop by medical departments. Once the drug user is on the phone, the hotline counselor can encourage him to get help through an EAP or local clinical program.

While helping current employees to quit taking drugs, many companies are working to make sure that they do not take on any additional drug users. More and more firms are requiring job applicants to submit to new, sophisticated laboratory tests that can detect traces of narcotics in urine samples, and before long, companies may also be testing hair.

The list of corporations that ask all job applicants to undergo urinalysis is like a roll call of the largest and most prestigious firms in the U.S. Among them: Exxon, IBM, Lockheed, Shearson Lehman, Federal Express, United Airlines, TWA, Hoffmann-La Roche, the New York Times. On March 1, Du Pont became the newest name on the list. And this spring, AT&T, which already tests applicants at plants where volatile chemicals are handled, will start screening all potential employees at its manufacturing facilities for drug use. About one-fourth of the Fortune 500 companies now screen applicants for drugs, and an additional 20% are expected to begin doing so this year.

An increasing number of firms are testing not only applicants but also certain classes of current employees. Rockwell, for example, makes test pilots give periodic urine samples. Dozens of companies, including the Los Angeles Times, Southern Pacific railroad and Georgia Power, an electric utility, now demand that employees take drug tests if their supervisors think they may be impaired. All the major U.S. oil companies have instituted such a policy for workers on drilling rigs. Since last month, a Federal Railroad Administration regulation has required some 100,000 employees who operate U.S. railroads to undergo urinalysis whenever their supervisors think they may be high. This week a new regulation takes effect requiring workers to take a test when they have been involved in a serious accident.

Drug testing of all employees is still rare, but some organizations are considering that step, especially in professional sports. After the New England Patriots suffered the most humiliating Super Bowl defeat (46-10) in history last January, the team admitted that several of its key players had been using illegal drugs during the season. Coach Raymond Berry has asked all players to submit to random drug testing. Two weeks ago, Baseball Commissioner Peter Ueberroth suspended seven players for one year without pay for using and distributing drugs. To be reinstated the players must give 10% of their 1986 salaries to drug-rehabilitation programs, contribute 100 hours of community service in each of the next two years and agree to drug testing on demand for the rest of their careers.

The largest employer to test all personnel is the U.S. military. Alarmed by rampant drug use among men and women in uniform, the Pentagon began widespread random testing in 1982, starting with the Army. At first, the program was developed so fast and handled so sloppily that it gave drug testing a bad name. Hundreds of soldiers claimed that they were falsely accused of being drug users because of inaccurate results.

In July 1984, the Army admitted that in tests of 60,000 soldiers, about half of the urine samples had been mishandled. In many cases, samples were mixed up in the lab, and service members received results from specimens that were not their own. Since then, the Pentagon has improved procedures and extended the tests to all branches of the armed forces. It claims to have cut drug use by military personnel in half since 1980.

The most widely used new urine test, known as EMIT (for Enzyme Multiplied Immunoassay Test), is believed to be 97% accurate in the best of circumstances. But since laboratory workers often mishandle or accidentally contaminate the samples during analysis, the rate of accuracy may be considerably less. Because of such doubts, few companies fire employees or refuse to hire applicants on the basis of only one test. If the first test indicates drug use, employers generally try to confirm that result with a second urinalysis using a different laboratory technique.

A few companies are waging a more active—and clandestine—war against drugs. GM, for example, has used private undercover agents supervised by the police to make some 200 arrests at its plants within the past 18 months. In the sting operation at the Wentzville plant, the company was able to hire two young former narcotics agents unobtrusively when it added a second shift. Dressed in T shrits and jeans, they mingled easily with the assembly-line workers. During a six-month period they bought everything from cocaine to LSD from the plant's alleged pushers. Says Dr. Robert Wiencek, GM's director of occupational safety and health: "We want any individual who is selling drugs in our plants to know that his days as a GM employee are numbered. We're not going to tolerate it." Last week Electronic Data Systems, a subsidiary of GM, began firing employees in the Detroit area who had failed drug-screening tests given to 104 security guards, clerks and secretaries in February.

Some firms are literally calling in the dogs. Canine detectives, trained to recognize the smell of marijuana and other drugs, have nosed around offshore oil platforms owned by Pennzoil, Mobil and Exxon. Atlanta's Alpha Academy of Dog Training supplies drug-sniffing German shepherds, springer spaniels and golden retrievers to corporate clients and law-enforcement agencies.

The corporate battle against drugs is a bonanza for dozens of small companies that provide the weapons. Private laboratories that perform drug tests, for example, are growing rapidly. So are security firms that supply undercover agents. Professional Law Enforcement, a five-year-old Dayton firm, has doubled its business in the past year. Says President William Taylor III: "Companies are starting to recognize that they have to attack the problem in a different way. You can't send a standard security guard or a management person out there to handle a person dealing in drugs."

Because narcotics abuse spawns stealing, companies that specialize in investigating employee theft are much in demand. A Baltimore firm called Loss Management provides its clients with a national hot line and has solved cases with the help of office tipsters who report theft at their place of work. In one case, a clerk called the hot line when the invoices she was processing did not add up correctly. As it turned out, three top managers at the company were embezzling money to buy cocaine.

Though employee support for finding antidrug programs is growing, some workers feel that their companies are going too far. At the Kansas City Star and Times, two newspapers owned by Capital Cities/ABC, employees were stunned in January when management proposed to use narcotics-sniffing dogs as part of an experimental antidrug effort. Though newsroom wags passed around dog biscuits, most employees were in no mood to laugh. They felt that using the dogs would be an implicit accusation and an unwarranted and heavy-handed action. After heated staff protests, Capital Cities/ABC backed down and called off the experiment.

Much of the criticism of corporate antidrug efforts focuses on the growing use of urinalysis. Opponents charge that urine tests are a particularly invasive and humiliating method of determining whether a worker has used drugs. Says Bus Driver Randy Kemp, whose employer, Seattle Metro, requires employees who appear to be impaired to submit blood and urine samples: "You've got to have a search warrant to search my house. Well, my body is a lot more sacred than my home."

Some executives agree. Hewlett-Packard and McDonnell Douglas, for example, do not ask job applicants or employees to take drug tests. Says Hewlett-Packard Spokesman Gene Endicott: "It's an invasion of the employee's privacy."

Another objection to urinalysis is that companies are trying to control what workers do in their private time as well as during working hours. Because the tests do not reveal when a drug was used, workers could be penalized or fired for what they do in the evening or at weekend parties. Workers' rights advocates maintain that corporate antidrug policies can be particularly unfair in the case of marijuana, which has been virtually decriminalized in some states and cities. Says Los Angeles Labor Lawyer Glenn Rothner: "Termination for marijuana use, or worse, for simply having minute traces of marijuana in the body when tested is sentencing these employees to the equivalent of corporate capital punishment for an offense that would only merit a $100 fine in California."

The reaction of organized labor to antidrug efforts has been mixed. Unions generally support corporate drug-rehabilitation programs, but opposition to urinalysis is growing. Says Douglas Maguire, director of the labor assistance program for the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, AFL-CIO: "Labor is not supporting testing in the workplace. As part of a physical exam for new employees, it is acceptable, but otherwise there are problems of violating civil rights." Some unions also fight against firings of workers with drug problems. Rockwell's Frankel quit as the company's medical director in 1983 partly because, he says, management repeatedly gave in to union demands that drug abusers be reinstated in their jobs.

Many executives are becoming increasingly impatient with the objections of labor leaders and civil libertarians. Says Peter Cherry of Cherry Electrical: "We have a right to say how you behave at the workplace. You don't bring a gun to work. You can't come to work naked. You're not allowed to yell 'Fire!' in the middle of the factory. We're just asking people to be fit while they're on the job."

Because drug use by workers can result in shoddy, unsafe products and accidents in the workplace, executives argue, individual rights must be subordinated to the broader welfare of fellow employees and customers. "We're not on a witch hunt," says Personnel Manager John Hunt of Southern California Edison. "Our No. 1 concern here is safety. We also have a responsibility to our customers. Our meter readers go into people's homes." Independent experts share the executives' concerns. Says Peter Bensinger, a former head of the Drug Enforcement Administration who is now a leading consultant on corporate drug problems: "Companies do have a right and responsibility to establish sound working conditions. We're talking about people and their safety, and our own individual rights to work in a safe environment." Company officials also point out that a strong stance against drugs is basically humanitarian because it ultimately benefits workers who use them as much as it does the firm.

Furthermore, the argument that what employees do in their own time is none of the company's business is being undermined by new evidence of the lingering effects of drug use. In November, researchers at the Stanford University School of Medicine and the Palo Alto Veterans Administration Medical Center published the results of a study on how marijuana use affects the ability of pilots to land planes. The pilots in the experiment smoked marijuana and then tested their skills in flight simulators. A full day after taking the drug, long after any sensation of being high had passed, the pilots were still swerving dangerously upon landing. One "crashed" his plane beside the runway. The researchers, who are now expanding the study, concluded that marijuana users may have difficulty performing complex mechanical tasks or doing work that demands quick reactions for 24 hours after smoking the drug.

While it is still too early to measure the success of the corporate war against drugs, some companies can already cite impressive results. Commonwealth Edison, a Chicago-based electric utility, started an antidrug education and rehabilitation program in 1982, offering treatment to users who came forward and threatening to fire those caught with drugs at work. The company also gives urine tests to job applicants. Since the program started, absenteeism is down 25%, and medical claims, which had been rising steadily at an average rate of 23% annually, rose only 6% last year. Moreover, the company has fewer on-the-job accidents in 1985 than in any previous year. Says Vice President J. Patrick Sanders: "I don't think that all of the improvements are directly related to the drug program. But it's got to be more than coincidental."

The corporate campaign against drugs may do more, however, than create safer, more productive workplaces. It may also begin to stem the plague of drug use in America. As more companies require job applicants to prove that they are drug free, it will become increasingly difficult to use drugs and make a living. The economic deterrent may begin to succeed where the legal deterrent has failed. Says Walsh of the National Institute on Drug Abuse: "We feel that if Big Business continues as it has in the last year to develop more and more stringent kinds of policies, it eventually will reduce the demand for illicit substances. It may be very effective in changing the way people view drug taking in this country."

Many executives believe that they can make a difference far beyond the office doors or the factory gates by insisting that their employees stay away from drugs. Says Capital Cities/ABC President Daniel Burke: "I consider drugs damn dangerous. I believe that my responsibility is such that my position against drugs has to be clearly understood by everyone who works under my direction." If companies can help employees kick the drug habit, the effort will pay dividens to business—and society—that cannot be measured in dollars and cents.—By Janice Castro.

Telltale Hair

Do cokeheads have hot hair? The answer to that question holds a potential way out for employers who wish to test workers or job applicants for drug use but are reluctant to face the delicate task of asking for urine or blood samples. Not surprisingly, executives and assembly-line workers often balk at the indignity of testing. But people might object less to losing just a snippet of hair, particularly if it meant a less demeaning and more accurate method of drug screening. The question is relevant because scientists have discovered that human hair holds a permanent record of all chemicals that a person has taken.

Los Angeles Chemist Werner Baumgartner has developed a new drug test that utilizes radiation. When performed on human hair, it reveals what drugs have been taken and, unlike blood or urine tests, shows when the chemicals were consumed.

Baumgartner and his partner, Psychopharmacologist Ronald Siegel, claim that the hair test is more reliable than urinalysis. The San Diego-based Navy Drug Rehabilitation Center has been using the test on an experimental basis since last December. At the same time, Baumgartner and Siegel are training technicians so that the test can be tried on a broader scale.

A fascinating sidelight of the research is that the test can be used on preserved hair samples from long-dead famous figures. Among samples that Baumgartner and Siegel have analyzed are locks belonging to John Keats, the 19th century poet. The test confirmed scholars' suspicions that the author of "Ode on a Grecian Urn" was an opium user.

The Other Plague

As executives confront the scary phenomenon of drug use on the job, they cannot afford to forget about an older and even more prevalent problem: alcoholism among workers. Though drinking hard liquor is not as fashionable as it once was the Americans have cut their average consumption of alcohol by 4% since 1980, the number of people who are addicted to booze has increased by 8%, to 12 million, according to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism. More than any other ailment, alcoholism breeds absenteeism, high medical bills and reduced work quality. North Carolina's Research Triangle Institute estimates that alcoholism cost the U.S. economy $117 billion in 1983, up 30% since 1980.

Today, though, physicians and counselors are increasingly encountering a different kind of alcoholic—one who uses both booze and drugs. Says Dr. Jules Trop, the administrator of the Addiction Treatment Center at Mount Sinai Medical Center in Miami Beach and himself a recovered cocaine addict: "A pure alcoholic is a rarity these days, just as a pure coke junkie is." Addicts who stick to alcohol alone are typically over 45, while younger people are more likely to use a combination of cocaine, marijuana and liquor. Dr. Joseph Pursch, medical director of CompCare, a chain of treatment centers based in Irvine, Calif., points out that workers who are drunk on the job sometimes think that cocaine or some other stimulant will sober them up and help them perform better.

Many companies' employee-assistance programs combat alcoholism and drug abuse with similar methods of hospital care and psychiatric counseling. Says Peggy Carey, manager of New England Telephone's treatment program: "We treat addicts as addicts, no matter what the substance."

While alcoholism strikes janitors and corporate chiefs alike, executives can be the most difficult to deal with. They often wield such power in an organization that few people feel able or willing to challenge their performance. Says Dr. Gregrory Collins, director of the alcohol and drug recovery program at the Cleveland Clinic: "Executives have very little accountability. They're very intimidating and don't come in [for treatment] until very late in the game."

In contrast to drug use, drinking usually starts out as an innocent, relatively harmless social pastime. Only later, and not always, does it turn out to be a problem. While a certain stigma still attaches to drug use despite its wide popularity, society remains tolerant of drinking even after it has passed the moderate stage. Says J. Bennet Tate, director of Kaiser Aluminum's treatment program: "Alcohol is easy. It's acceptable. It's legal." That is why curbing alcoholism will never be a simple task."

Testing Testing

When it comes to broad-scale efforts to check out employee drug use, the toughest test of all may be the court test. Even some members of the President's Commission on Organized Crime were surprised at the commission's recommendation that tests be given to many employees of the U.S. and of private companies with federal contracts. Like the other 18 commissioners, Thomas McBride, associate dean of Stanford Law School, saw a draft of the report but not the staff-prepared final version. The language calling for broad testing was an effort to reconcile various suggestions from the commissioners. "I never would have approved it," McBride says.

Since the phenomenon of drug testing is relatively new, the legal limits are not yet clear. Public employees are protected by the Fourth and 14th Amendments' safeguards of privacy and due process. But, says Michigan Federal Judge Avern Cohn, if the tests are "job related or have something to do with job performance, then the courts are going to uphold them." As for private-sector employees, because the Constitution is concerned largely with dealings between citizens and government, its provisions do not apply to most relations between them and their employers. Even so, argues Berkeley Law School Dean Jesse Choper, it would be excessive "to invade the body, in mass testing, without any particular cause to believe that any particular individual is a user." Job seekers may be the least protected of all. Most authorities believe that companies may require pre-employment drug screening for every applicant.

Here and there rules on the leeway and limits are beginning to emerge for those on the job. Some union contracts define when workers may be tested or dismissed. A Greyhound mechanic in Detroit was twice fired after testing positive for marijuana, and twice reinstated by arbitrators—first because the procedure was error prone and not described to employees in advance, then because there was no indication that he was not doing his job adequatly. In those cases that have come before them, courts have been looking closely at such issues as how reliable and how invasive a test is. For instance, to prevent cheating, witnesses sometimes must accompany those giving urine samples.

Several important cases are under way, notably a wrongful-dismissal suit brought against Southern Pacific by a computer-program designer. She was fired for refusing to submit to urinalysis ordered by the company last July for more than 200 randomly chosen employees in San Francisco. The uproar following that incident led the city to pass the nation's first ordinance barring employers from administering blood, urine or electroencephalogram tests at random. Legislation to restrict or regulate drug testing is being considered by Oregon, Maryland, Maine and California.

BURIED BY A TROPICAL SNOWSTORM

Not long ago in the woods of Georgia, a black bear wandering in search of food came across an air-dropped duffel bag packed with about 75 lbs. of cocaine. The animal proceeded to nibble at the coke until it died from an overdose. At about the same time in Haiti, millions of dollars' worth of poorly aimed cocaine packages fell upon an isolated farming village. The natives tried to make the mysterious substance into a whitewash for their huts but discovered it worked better as a foot powder and diaper-rash treatment. They began selling it for about $50 a kilogram (actual wholesale value: $30,000 per kg) until police heard about their windfall and carted away what was left of the drug.

Like an acid rain, cocaine is pouring from the sky and corroding everything it touches. Although the battle to keep coke and other illegal drugs out of U.S. offices and factories may be a winnable one, shutting those substances out of the country is another story. The Reagan Administration's campaign to stop the smugglers, an effort backed by $1.2 billion last year compared with $708 million in 1981, seems to make the outlaws only craftier and more coldblooded. Total imports of heroin and marijuana have declined somewhat, but cocaine now flows into the U.S. from Latin America at a rate of roughly 125 tons a year, compared with about 58 tons in 1982. "Despite the rhetorical bravado and a few highly publicized successes, the U.S. effort has been a bitter disappointment," says Ted Galen Carpenter, a foreign-policy expert at the Cato Institute, a Washington research organization.

Because of the booming supply, cocaine users are getting far more buzz for their buck. Even though U.S. coke consumption went up 11% in 1984, the most recent year for which statistics are available, the price has dropped from $100 a gram to as low as $60 in some cities. Meanwhile, well-stocked dealers have substantially boosted the purity of street cocaine, which makes the drug more attractive than ever.

Even so, the Reagan Administration can claim some victories, notably in starting to control the growth of trafficking in the cocaine corridor of Florida and the Caribbean. "We are having a major impact on the supply side," declares John Lawn, chief of the federal Drug Enforcement Administation. The South Florida Task Force, launched by President Reagan in March 1982 and headed by Vice President Bush, has brought more personnel and high-tech gear to the task. AWACS-type aircraft and three tethered balloons—soon to be eight—provide radar to help authorities keep track of nearly every plane and ship that moves through the region.

In downtown Miami the drug busters have just finished building an ultramodern electronic command post that resembles the bridge of the U.S.S. Enterprise in Star Trek. Drug agents hover 24 hours a day over four multicolored radar screens that display the entire region's traffic. When authorities spot a suspicious craft, they quickly calculate which law-enforcement boats or planes can make the fastest interception. Then they dispatch the police craft with a state-of-the-art radio network that puts dozens of federal and local agencies on the same wavelength. Cutoms Service technicians built the system from scratch, starting with computer software borrowed from the Pentagon. "We're light-years ahead of the military. I'm very proud of it," says Michael Wewers, a Customs Service special agent.

Yet the show of force in South Florida has resulted in much faster growth of the smuggling business at other border crossings and landing strips from San Diego to Portland, Me. Smugglers' jets equipped with long-range fuel tanks now bypass Florida's notorious narcs and land instead in South Carolina, Tennessee or even New York's Long Island, which puts the product only a few miles from Manhattan's penthouses and discos. The influx has prompted New York Governor Mario Cuomo to assign 200 more officers to drug-enforcement squads.

The Northwest has also become a smuggler's cove. In January the Coast Guard tracked the 195-ft. Honduran freighter Eagle One as it tried to sneak up the California coast toward Seattle. Just outside Puget Sound, drug agents boarded the ship and took it into dock, where they seized 447 lbs. of cocaine in a welded-shut compartment. Says Robert Dreisbach, spokesman for the Seattle office of the DEA: "The smugglers are moving away from the heavily patrolled ports, and we are particularly vulnerable because of our less dense popluation along an immense amount of coastline."

By far the busiest new cocaine alley is the 2,100-mile Mexican border. "It's a sieve, and we don't have enough fingers to plug all the holes," says Drexel Watson, a senior special agent for the Customs Service. "More drugs than ever are coming in. It's pretty devastating." Mexico has become a conduit for as much as a third of the South American cocaine entering the U.S. Mexico is also grabbing larger shares of the U.S. markets for heroin and marijuana. Partly because of Mexico's economic woes, struggling farmers have boosted their crops of opium poppies and marijuana plants. U.S. consumer demand for their output has increased as well. Mexico's illicit heroin-refining labs have upgraded their equipment so that their product, previously a crude substance dubbed "Mexican brown," now competes with purer varieties from Southeast Asia. At the same time, Mexico's marijuana has made a comeback with bargain-minded smokers; it costs only $100 or less an ounce on the street, compared with $200 for California's superpotent sinsemilla.

Narcotraficantes usually have little trouble moving South American coke by plane or ship from processing plants in Colombia to stopover depots in Mexico. The next step, crossing the U.S. border, requires more subterfuge. Typical methods: flying at night to deserted airstrips in the Southwest or hiding the drugs in the axles and wheel wells of cars and trucks.

The smugglers and U.S. Customs agents play a high-stakes cat-and-mouse game at the Tijuana-San Ysidro border crossing, an inspection station that handles 27,000 vehicles a day. On one recent afternoon, a raggedly dressed vendor carrying a load of serapes could be seen watching the inspectors and tipping off the Mexican driver of a pickup truck to work his way over to lane 7, where a weary Customs officer was waving most cars through without a check. At the same time, another supposed vendor worked the other side, scrutinizing the vehicles for the Customs agents and whispering into a miniature radio when he spotted a nervous-looking driver.

The U.S. inspectors no longer have to waste time ripping apart a car to find contraband. They now wield high-tech instruments, including fiber-optic devices for examining the interiors of gas tanks and ultrasonic range finders to determine whether hollow panels really are empty. Last week the San Diego district began a policy of tougher inspections that had cars backed up for more than a mile.

Despite such scrutiny, "an astronomical amount is getting through," admits Customs District Director Allan Rappoport. Worse still, the so-called mule skinners who are caught with the shipments seldom turn out to be Mr. Big. "The people who drive the vehicles are usually very poor and uneducated," says one U.S. drug agent. "There is so much poverty in Mexico that traffickers have an unlimited labor pool. The drivers almost always keep their mouths shut, since they have been told that their wives and kids will be blown away otherwise."

U.S. agents have been hamstrung in their efforts to catch smuggling kingpins south of the border because many Mexican government officials are on the traffickers' payroll. When smugglers tortured and murdered DEA agent Enrique Camerena Salazar near Guadalajara last March, Mexican investigators seemed to be looking the other way. But honest members of Mexico's government are just as upset as Americans about the violence bred by smuggling. In a massacre last November, an army of 50 marijuana traffickers equipped with automatic weapons shot and killed 17 Mexican police officers and seven guides.

Frustrated U.S. drug busters may have decided to go outside diplomatic channels to apprehend one reputed marijuana smuggler, René Martin Verdugo, who is suspected of being involved in the DEA agent's killing.

Verdugo, widely known as La Rana (the Frog), was walking the streets of tiny San Felipe, Mexico, on Jan. 24 when six masked men pounced on him and whisked him into an unmarked car. They drove their blindfolded captive north to an obscure stretch of the Mexican border near Calexico, Calif., where they handed him through a hole in the fence to U.S. marshals. He is now in a San Diego jail awaiting trial on smuggling charges.

Cocaine money has compromised many government officials in the Caribbean, where smugglers seek islands as rest-and-refueling stops for trips to the U.S. In the words of one disheartened religious leader in Barbados, politicians "see the glint of gold and not the blood dripping from this accursed money." In the Bahamas, an inquiry by a three-member panel implicated two Cabinet members in drug smuggling and nearly toppled the administration of Prime Minister Lynden O. Pindling. Commented the Miami Herald in an editorial: "The panel portrays a country haunted by cocaine abuse, a police force riddled with corruption, lawyers perverted by greed and a government tainted by widespread influence peddling."

Most cocaine arrives in the U.S. aboard private aircraft, which the smugglers consider expendable. Even a $450,000 Cessna twin-engine plane costs far less than the millions of dollars of cocaine it can carry. The latest stunt among cocaine pilots has been to air-drop a shipment of cocaine, then put the aircraft on automatic pilot and bail out. One pilot laden down with 79 lbs. of cocaine was killed last September in Tennessee when his parachute failed.

An estimated 18% of coke shipments arrive on commercial airlines. Last month a DEA official revealed that a grand jury was preparing criminal indictments against as many as 50 Eastern Air Lines workers, mostly baggage handlers, who allegedly had smuggled a billion dollars' worth of cocaine into Miami in the cargo bellies of jets. Customs officers routinely find large caches of cocaine aboard flights from the main producing countries, Peru, Bolivia and Colombia. Inspectors at Miami International Airport found a near-record shipment of 3,227 lbs. of cocaine in January aboard a cargo jet owned by Avianca, the Colombian national airline. Agents discovered the drug when they opened 55-gal. barrels of passion fruit in syrup and found football-shaped containers of coke bobbing in the mixture.

Some airborne smugglers try to bring coke or heroin through Customs in their baggage, an old-fashioned but sometimes successful ploy. Another, potentially deadly, technique is to pack the drug in condoms and swallow them or insert them in body orifices. If the package breaks, the carrier is likely to die of an overdose. One day last November, inspectors at New York's Kennedy Airport caught 13 smugglers who had swallowed or inserted their contraband.

Besides pinching the inflow of drugs, the Government has tried to squeeze the outflow of profits. Since 1980 the Treasury Department has required financial institutions to report any transaction involving more than $10,000 in cash, a step that has sharply limited the ability of trafficking tycoons to invest or spend their money. In the past year the Government has clamped down on twelve major banks that failed to file the forms and may have been accepting drug money, wittingly or otherwise. In January the Treasury Department fined BankAmerica a record $4.75 million for such offenses.

The Administration ultimately hopes to cut smugglers off at the source by persuading producing countries to root out their drug crops. Yet despite an increase in cooperation from such nations as Thailand and Peru, many developing countries have mixed feelings about eradication programs because their peasants earn far more money cultivating opium poppies or coca plants than they would get from corn or cotton. Bolivia, for example, earns $1 billion a year from cocaine, its largest export.

Developing countries see drug abuse as America's dilemma, not theirs. Says Bolivian Interior Minister Fernando Barthelemy: "It is unfair to put most of the weight on the coca-producing countries when it is a simple law of demand. American and Western European consumers keep doping more and more. Consequently more coca is planted." For that reason, U.S. corporations that try to stem the demand for drugs are getting right to the heart of the problem

KIDS AND COCAINE

(Mr. Yummy was known all over Columbia, S.C., as the friendly ice-cream man. His drivers cruised around town in a fleet of red, white and blue trucks, broadcasting peppy tunes over the loudspeaker as they peddled snow cones, Nutty Buddies and Popsicles to the kids. But one day some of Mr. Yummy's teenage customers discovered a strange new flavor for sale: cocaine. The Richland County Sheriff's Department investigated, and on Feb. 7, 1986, deputies seized 15 grams of coke at the company office. Mr. Yummy's owner, Hugh M. Gill, 39, and an office employee were arrested and charged with trafficking; they are expected to plead not guilty. "We have indications that they definitely were selling to children," says Sheriff Frank Powell.)

It would be funny if it weren't so frightening—and if, in cities and suburbs all across the nation, a generation of American children were not increasingly at risk to the nightmare of cocaine addiction. As thousands of teens have already learned to their families' infinite sorrow, coke is it in the 1980s—the most glamorous, seductive, destructive, dangerous drug on the supersaturated national black market. The federal government's failed attempts to interdict smuggling from Central and South America has allowed a flood tide of cocaine to reach consumers of all ages in this country: prices are down, purity is up and The Man doesn't care if you're under 21. "There are two trends in cocaine use," says Frank LaVecchia, a former high-school guidance counselor who runs a drug-treatment center in suburban Miami. "Younger and younger and more and more."

Most Americans stopped listening to Cassandras like LaVecchia long ago—and most, it seems, think they know all there is to know about cocaine. They "know," for example, that coke is very expensive and that it is widely used as a recreational drug by jet-setters—by movie moguls, rock stars and professional athletes. They know it is usually absorbed through the membranes of the nose and they "know" it is only mildly addictive.

But all of that is half-truth at best—and at worst, it is a dangerous myth. The plain fact is that cocaine abuse is the fastest-growing drug problem in America for adults and school-age children alike. The plain fact is that coke is widely available at low prices—within the financial reach of the young. And the plain fact is that coke is now being sold and used in an especially destructive new form. The new coke goes by many names on the street, but it is usually called "crack" or "rock." It is smoked, not snorted, and the resulting intoxication is far more intense than that of snorted cocaine—much quicker, much more euphoric and much, much more addictive. "Crack is the most addictive drug known to man right now," says Arnold Washton, a psychopharmacologist at Fair Oaks Hospital in Summit, N.J. "It is almost instantaneous addiction, whereas if you snort coke it can take two to five years before addiction sets in. There is no such thing as the 'recreational use' of crack."

Crack is simply a variant on "freebasing," which is the conversion of sniffable cocaine crystals into a smokable "base" form of the drug. Most Americans heard about freebasing for the first time in 1980, when comedian Richard Pryor sustained third-degree burns when he accidentally ignited a container of ether, a flammable solvent then used in the conversion process. But ether is no longer needed to make base cocaine—and the conversion process is so simple it can be performed in any kitchen. Dealers make crack by mixing cocaine with common baking soda and water, creating a paste that is usually at least 75 percent cocaine. The paste hardens and is cut into chips that resemble soap or whitish gravel. A small piece, sometimes called "a quarter rock," produces a 20-to 30-minute high. It is usually smoked in water pipes.

Crack is not widely used in many areas of the country—but that may only be a matter of time. It is already creating social havoc in the ghettos of Los Angeles, New York and other large cities, and it is rapidly spreading into the suburbs on both coasts. It is probably a major reason that cocaine abuse among the young is on the rise, although the available national surveys do not distinguish between cocaine in its usual form and crack. "Right now, we don't know the answer," says Edgar Adams, acting director of epidemiology and statistical analysis at the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA). "Is crack responsible for the increase or is the increase responsible for crack? We do know that cocaine use has gone up among high-school seniors, and we have been hearing about crack for eight months or so. I think it's entirely feasible that as the price has gone down you've had more people able to try it."

Adams's stress on "unit-dose distribution" is a cautious way of saying that crack is a drug dealer's dream. It is easy to prepare, easy to use, easy to hide—and a single dose sells for as little as $10 to $15. "Crack itself is a marketing effort." says Washton. "Like fast food, it's a quick-sale product. [Because] it transforms the occasional cocaine user into an addictive user, it is much more likely to yield a repeat customer." Though the dealer himself may be an adult, crack is widely peddled by juvenile front men—primarily because teenagers, under the law in most states, normally do not face heavy penalties when arrested. According to NIDA sociologist Michael Backenheimer, crack "is an extremely dangerous precedent because the distribution level now includes the kids. It's a form that is terribly pure and a form that is smoked. In certain cities they have 'crack houses' where it is totally possible to buy a 'rock' for $10. I was even told that an ice-cream truck in one city was actually peddling this stuff. If that's true, it scares the hell out of me."

In New York, eager buyers queue up outside crack houses like movie fans outside a theater—and the lines, according to one drug agent, "are loaded with kids." There are white kids, black kids, Hispanic kids—kids from the ghetto and kids from the suburbs. Austin Muldoon, a New York City police officer, remembers a recent crack house bust in upper Manhattan. Muldoon was stationed in an alley while his partners broke through the apartment door. The dealer dumped the evidence—a plastic bag containing several hundred vials of crack—out a window. Muldoon soon found himself mobbed by "a crowd of people, including young kids" begging for free drugs. The mob engulfed him, and Muldoon was forced to run. Breaking tackles and clutching the plastic bag in his arms he escaped from the alleyway with his dignity—and the evidence—barely intact. It was just another day in the war against cocaine.

"We have lost the cocaine battle," Los Angeles police detective Frank Goldberg says flatly. Goldberg is a juvenile-narcotics officer who works L.A.'s south central black ghetto—an area where rock is epidemic and where the dealers, many of them in their teens, have taken over. Like some other big-city ghettos, south central L.A. is infested with rock houses: also known as crack houses or base houses, they are centers of the new cocaine trade. Typically, a rock house is a rented apartment or bungalow with a reinforced steel door. The dealer sits inside with his drugs, taking money and doling out doses of crack through a slot in the door. The door prevents ripoffs by the customers, and it slows down the cops: by the time a police raiding party breaks in, the dealer can flush his coke stash down the toilet. Some rock houses have a room for customers as well: typically, it contains a mattress, a TV set and a water pipe. In many respects, crack houses are the modern-day equivalent of opium dens—and their clientele includes young people from the suburbs as well as the city and from virtually every level of society.

Crack, with its enormous profits and violent crime, has transformed the ghetto. To a striking degree, the coke boom is a youth phenomenon: in both L.A. and New York, crack houses are protected by armed teenagers. Other teens hawk crack on street corners, and in some cities dealers ply their trade from cars: in Atlanta, where suburban teens have begun driving into the city to make quick curbside purchasers, it's known as "stop-and-cop." ("To cop" is junkie slang for buying drugs.) "The size of the cocaine market is beyond description," says Lt. Joe Kunkel of the Houston police. "It's everywhere. You could stand on any street corner in town and say, 'I want a toot' and three people will try to sell it to you." And in Camden County, N.J., where police have sent undercover agents into local high schools (page 62), prosecutor Samuel Asbell is convinced that the city's contagion has already spread to suburbia.

Police in Houston and Los Angeles estimate that hundreds of rock houses are operating in their cities at any given time, and the same statement could be made about New York, where Police Commissioner Benjamin Ward has declared crack to be the top-priority drug-enforcement problem of 1986. "They're like fast-food franchises," Kunkel says of Houston's rock houses. "They rent a location, bring in a crew of kids to work it, and if those kids get busted the middleman just gets another crew." For a ghetto teenager, working in a crack house means big money. "When a 16-year-old can sit in a rock house for six or seven hours and earn $300 a day just for taking the chance of getting busted, he sees that as a good tradeoff," says Sgt. Michael Jennings of the Houston of P.D.L.A.P.D. detective Steve Havel says the kids "are living a 'Miami Vice' fantasy—heavy gold chains, $200 sweat suits, 500SEC Mercedeses and a $160 Porsche sunglasses. Their aspiration is to be a successful supplier with a string of drug concessions and a string of condos."

The side effect is violence—and even hardened street cops are shocked by the viciousness of the cocaine wars now raging in big cities. The dealers are armed heavily—pistols are commonplace and automatic carbines are de rigueur—and their teenage guards carry weapons as well. Rubouts and ripoffs are frequent, and law-abiding neighbors are cowed. Over the past three years, 57 persons have been killed in drug-related violence in Oakland, Calif., and a community leader in south L.A. compared her neighborhood to "Beirut, without the tanks." But that was a year ago: since then, the L.A.P.D. has escalated the cocaine-war arms race by deploying a six-ton truck with a 14-foot battering ram to punch through the rock houses' steel doors.

Marshall Hardy has cleaned up his act—but it was not so long ago that he was dealing and using cocaine. As a high-school student in Corpus Christi, Texas, he says, he could make "one phone call and get you a quarter of a pound of coke. I sold to kids my own age, and I subcontracted to my brother-in-law to sell to attorneys and judges. When I was 16 I paid cash for a brown Jaguar. I'd fly to L.A. or Acapulco for an evening just to go out with girls." It all came apart when Hardy was 17—for he was by then addicted, in jail and facing a 10-year sentence. With help from Cenikor, a privately funded anti-drug program in Houston, Hardy brought his addiction under control; now 26, he is teaching others about the dangers of coke. "The attraction is still there—I still get a Pavlovian response when I look at sugar or coffee creamer," Hardy says. "The hardest part is knowing that the whole coke culture is just a phone call away."

There is simply no question that cocaine in all its forms is seeping into the nation's schools. An annual survey conducted by the Institute of Social Research at the University of Michigan shows the percentage of high-school seniors who have ever tried cocaine has nearly doubled in the past 10 years, from 9 percent to 17.3 percent (chart). The use of all other drugs—marijuana, stimulants, depressants and so on—has leveled off or declined in recent years, although researchers now fear the decline has ended. Overall, marijuana remains the most widely used illicit drug among high-school seniors: 49.6 percent say they have used it within the past year. It is followed by stimulants (15.8 percent) and cocaine (13.1 percent). Predictably, because of the pattern of cocaine distribution from South America, school-age cocaine abuse is higher on the East and West coasts—but it has also increased significantly in all areas of the country.

The reality of school-age drug abuse in any given community cannot, of course, be inferred from national surveys—just as the presence of drugs in a given school does not predict that any individual student will use them. And it is still broadly true that the vast majority of American high-school students will pass through the turmoils of adolescence without succumbing to addiction. But it is also true, according to Lloyd Johnston, program director of the Institute for Social Research, that "there is no other industrialized country in the world that has a comparable proportion of young people involved with illicit drugs." Cocaine abuse by school-age children is growing rapidly, and experts somberly predict that the worst is yet to come. "We haven't yet seen all the consequences of cocaine use among teenagers and young adults," says Prof. Everett H. Ellinwood of Duke University. "It's marched through all the cultural heroes—entertainers, baseball players, quarterbacks. It's marched through all the fastlane professionals. Now we're seeing a gradual progression down to kids and people at the marginal economic levels."

The carriers of cocaine abuse are most often the kids themselves—for as the national statistics on high-school seniors suggest, years of well-intentioned efforts have so far failed to eradicate the drug culture among the young. Cocaine's increasing availability, its glamour and its undeserved reputation as a low-risk high have combined to expand its appeal to teenagers. Over the past 10 years, Johnston says, the Michigan survey has recorded a steady increase in the percentage of high-school students who say cocaine is available to them: the latest figure, for 1985, is 49 percent. At the same time, he says, the survey shows that "a great number of high-school seniors see a great risk in being regular marijuana users—but very few see experimenting with cocaine as a great risk."

Parents and school authorities, similarly, are largely uninformed about cocaine—and most know even less about its fearsome stepchild, crack. "They're worried about marijuana and cocaine paraphernalia. We explain rock, and they're surprised," says Tom Weschler, a Miami Beach detective. "Unfortunately, a lot of parents don't recognize what's going on."

They started young, usually with pot, and moved on to coke—sometimes snorted, sometimes injected, sometimes freebased. Now they're patients at Phoenix House, a residential treatment center in Orange County, Calif. "When I first smoked rock I fell in love," says Samantha. "I wanted to do more right away. I would lie, steal—anything for a hit off the pipe. It gets hold of you real fast." To Amy, "coke was the wonder drug, and freebasing was better than sex. I had no morals: I'd do anything with my body for coke." Dan, a bleached-blond 15-year-old from Orange County, stole from his parents, from his employer and from neighbors. "I used all the cash for drugs," he says. "I didn't care about food, I didn't care about a bed. It was scary on the street, but the cocaine made it all right." Dan says about half the kids at his old high school now use coke.

There are three ways for a teenage user to support a habit, and none of them is legal. There is theft, there is prostitution, and there is dealing drugs to other kids. The police see all three. "If you don't make a dope deal before lunch in some schools, you're out of luck," says detective Everett Berry, who works the high-school drug beat for the L.A.P.D. "They're sold out." Berry's men watched one young pusher dealing at a video arcade in the San Fernando Valley: the boy drove a $14,000 Toyota pickup and wore a beeper to keep in touch with his supplier. He sold $600 worth of rock before police made the bust. Last December Berry's team swept up dealers from eight different high schools in a single week; rock cocaine was being sold at seven of the eight schools. "It makes no difference whether it was a white, affluent high school, a black inner-city school or a Latino school," Berry says. "The only difference is rich kids buy $100 rocks and ghetto kids buy quarter rocks."

Dealing has its own mystique. Teen pushers, according to Marshall Hardy, view themselves as powerful, successful, adult—and the rewards are commensurate. In Houston, Sgt. Michael Jennings recalls, "we had one informant in a good high school who was dealing $30,000 a month. He bought a Mercedes for cash, and all his parents said was, 'Oh, you got a job.'" Tulane University Prof. Richard Garey, a psychiatrist who treats young drug offenders, had a patient from a wealthy New Orleans family who made enough money selling cocaine to buy a red Porsche—which he kept at a friend's house. "Where the coke is, the girls are," says a youthful ex-dealer from suburban L.A. "I had all the girls I wanted—I had all the sex I wanted."

Measured against the array of powerful allures that cocaine offers, society's attempts to wean the young from drugs seem mostly ineffectual. Many drug-abuse experts quietly concede that in-school drug-prevention programs, necessary though they may be, have largely failed to reach their teenage audience: there is still widespread disagreement about the root causes of drug abuse and equally little consensus on the best tactics for prevention. Law enforcement, similarly, has some impact in deterring youthful users—but few police officials would claim that teen trafficking is under control. In the bleak view of many experts, drug use will persist among young Americans as long as adult America condones it—and adult America, they say, tacitly accepts drugs in many forms, cocaine included. Worse yet, kids in many areas have already heard about the potency of crack and rock. "Rock sells itself—it's not as much due to 'peer pressure' as the experts will have you believe," says Elizabeth Skaggs, assistant director of the East Oakland, Calif., Recovery Center. "Ask any kid. He'll say the rush is such a great sensation that you want the rush again."

And that is precisely the point: crack is intensely addictive. Indeed, recent research on cocaine is changing the definition of addiction itself. According to many researchers, the traditional emphasis on physiological dependence must be broadened to include the much subtler psychological compulsion that drives an addict back to drugs again and again. Cocaine floods the pleasure centers of the brain—and using crack, says Arnold Washton, "multiplies the dangers of using coke 5 to 10 times." Crack, in short, may well be the nightmare drug that proves the Cassandras right—but as Washton says, the kids (and many parents) "have learned to discount scare tactics—and now when crack comes along, no one wants to listen." That heedlessness is ultimately as dangerous as crack itself—and may yet cost a generation the joys of growing up.

TALE OF THREE ADDICTIONS

STILL MISSING, STILL DEALING

The banging started on Eileen's door at 3 a.m. It was her 19-year-old daughter, Lori, emaciated, high on crack and begging to be let in. "I picked her up to throw her out and felt her bones sticking out. It scared the hell out of me," Eileen says. She took her daughter in, but the truce didn't last. Lori balked at entering a drug-treatment program. One day last month she left the New York City apartment and never returned. Her mother's gold bracelet and $100 were missing as well.

As Eileen tells it, Lori began slipping away about five years ago. Divorced 16 years ago, Eileen struggled hard to raise her daughter alone, but Lori didn't seem to appreciate her efforts. She was like her friends, Eileen says bitterly: "They all have this idea that they have had terrible lives, that the toughness of the world is on their shoulders and that the world owes them." At 15, Lori dropped out of school and began smoking marijuana. At 17, she moved in with friends, and Eileen suspects she was first exposed to cocaine then. Last year Lori had an abortion, and she was hospitalized briefly after taking an overdose of sleeping pills in a suicide attempt.

At times, Lori has reached out for help. Last month she confided that she and her boyfriend had spent $15,000 on crack since September. She has introduced so many friends to drugs that her name is "as good as gold—she's their dealer," her mother says in horror. Ironically, Eileen wishes Lori's crisis had come sooner: "Maybe if she had done crack when she was 15, I could have done something for her then."

Now all Eileen can do is wait in desperation. "At this stage," she says, "she's cutting herself off from anyone who doesn't have what she wants—money, drugs or a place to stay." Once she called the hotel where she believed Lori was living. Lori said she had the wrong number and hung up. Eileen refused to go to the hotel herself because she fears Lori's friends. Two weeks ago Lori called collect to say she'd heard her mother wanted her arrested for stealing the bracelet and the $100. She wouldn't say where she was, but Eileen suspects she is somewhere in New York, still high on crack and dealing. The phone call, Eileen believes, was simply a way of saying that "she is still alive."

CHILD OF THE MEAN STREETS

Heather is torn between two worlds. She is no longer addicted to crack, but her mother often calls begging her to return to their life on the streets. Since finishing the first phase of a Hayward, Calif., program for chemically dependent adolescents, however, Heather has refused. "The most important lesson I've learned is that I'm worth something," says the 13-year-old Hispanic girl who looks twice her age. Only a small "12" tattooed on her hand betrays her past. It was tattooed there one night after she did 12 bags of heroin and 12 lines of cocaine. Now, it reminds her of the 12 stages of drug-abuse recovery.

Heather grew up fast. When she was five, her drug-addict parents left her to be raised near Oakland by her grandmother, Leslie Greene. She was seven when she began experimenting with marijuana and PCP. At 11, she went to live with her mother and joined her world of sex and drugs: She turned to prostitution when her habit reached $200 a day. She returned to her grandmother the following year, but soon she ran away. She was raped twice and arrested for heroin use, and even when she moved back to her grandmother's house, she continued using crack. One night last January she returned home intoxicated and high on PCP. "I walked into the house, then I fell on the floor and started kicking and screaming, telling my grandmother to kill me," Heather recalls. Instead her grandmother enrolled her in the drug-treatment program. "It was the first time I was strong enough to say, 'That's it'," Greene says.

The beginning was difficult. "She was hard to read—cold and distant," says Richard Dutra, manager of the 20-bed inpatient program. "I don't always trust others with my feelings," Heather admits. Soon, however, she was talking openly. Emphasizing family interaction along with detoxification, the program teaches teens they will never be free of the urge to use drugs or the pressures of the world outside. "They can't leave it all to start anew," says 19-year-old Ayrron Comini, who attends a rap group with Heather in the second phase of her treatment. "They are thrown back into a hell hole." In Heather's case, the pressures are tremendous. But she is facing the challenge with a maturity few 13-year-olds know. As Heather herself puts it, "There's no way I can be a kid again."

A CHEERLEADER'S FALL—AND RISE

At 14, Andrea Schiros had it all. She was a cheerleader in suburban Atlanta, a member of the homecoming queen's court and an honor student who thought that taking drugs was dumb. But Andrea did an abrupt about-face when she was suspended from the cheerleading squad for putting on lipstick during class. She bleached her hair white and cut it in a Mohawk. As her mother, Jan, remembers, "She went from preppy to punk in seven months."

No longer in the teenage social elite, Andrea sought acceptance in the school's drug culture. "I just wanted to be 'it' again, and I was, with another group," she says. Soon her grades dropped to F's, she couldn't wake up in the morning, and she had screaming fights with her divorced mother. "I was strung out on coke, acid—everything I could put into my body," Andrea recalls. Jan suspected drugs, but when she broached the subject, Andrea ran away. Friends found her a sanctuary in a rundown Atlanta neighborhood called Cabbagetown and introduced her to free-based cocaine. Andrea called an old school friend, giving her a phone number "in case anything happens to me." The call probably saved her life.

The friend finally betrayed Andrea's secret to Andrea's frantic parents. Two juvenile officers plucked her from a seedy apartment about 4 a.m. and later that day, she was committed to Charter Brook Hospital, a drug-rehabilitation center for youths. "She was screaming and carrying on," Jan says. But shortly after admission, Andrea grew determined to come clean. "I wanted help," she said. "I was about dead."

Andrea'a most vivid memory of treatment was being able to see colors again. In the depths of her addiction, she saw eveything in shades of black and gray. She stayed in the locked inpatient program for seven months, then attended public school part-time for five months. In January she was released to the third phase of the program—called aftercare—and still attends Narcotics Anonymous meetings every night. She changed schools to avoid her old drug-based friendships and has to fight temptation constantly. "Most everyone in high school uses in some way or other—even if it's just drinking on the weekends," she says. But Andrea is determined to stay off drugs. "Look at what staying clean has done for me. I'm going to go for it." She is earning straight A's. She hopes to attend Pratt Institute after graduation and is living in a far happier household with a new stepfather who has taken an active role in her recovery. "Now, I tell my mother I love her—more than once a day," Andrea says. "It's been a miracle."

A NARC GOES UNDERCOVER AT CHERRY HILL EAST HIGH

When he enrolled at New Jersey's Cherry Hill East High School last fall, Richard Minardi seemed to be just an ordinary kid—though a little more anxious than most to join the drug scene. Five months later students learned that Minardi was a narc: a youthful-looking 27-year-old undercover cop from the Camden County prosecutor's Narcotics Strike Force assigned to ferret out drugs at the school.

Sending a narc to class is the most controversial of the antidrug measures at schools across the country. Many offer drug education and counseling but undercover operations such as the one at Cherry Hill East raise serious questions about privacy and the role of a school. Says Arnold May, a senior at the school: "We're here to learn, not to be investigated." School and law-enforcement officials defend using what Camden County Prosecutor Samuel Asbell calls "a positive scare tactic." He says that at Cherry Hill East and nearby schools, almost half of the students use drugs.

Minardi concentrated on a small group of these students. For three months he watched and participated in drug deals on and off the sprawling 55.7-acre campus in an affluent Philadelphia suburb. The end of this subterfuge shocked many of the 2,800 students. At 8 a.m. on Jan. 30, an assistant principal rounded up nine students and brought them to a school conference room where a dozen plainclothes officers and Minardi were waiting to arrest them on a variety of drug charges, including trafficking in cocaine. Minardi's disguise had been so successful that most of those arrested didn't realize even then that he was a narc. "I talked with that kid," said one student, glaring at Minardi. "He was in the market to buy." Other students felt similarly betrayed. "We felt we were spied on," says Warren Moliken, 18, president of the Student Congress. But principal Anthony Cost, who boasts of his school's academic record, says he nonetheless saw the usefulness of the undercover operation as "one more weapon in our arsenal to fight drug abuse."

The school has for some years relied on more traditional antidrug programs. Drug-education classes are part of the health curriculum, and a separate program sends high-school students to elementary schools to warn youngsters to stay away from drugs. At the high school a psychologist and social worker are available for counseling. Even with all this, Cost decided in 1981 that the problem was severe enough to warrant more forceful action.

These measures have turned the high school into something Beaver Cleaver's brother, Wally, would not recognize. Two unarmed police officers patrol school hallways and make periodic drug checks of lockers and other areas. If any are discovered, a student can be suspended, arrested and referred to counseling. Kids suspected of drug use can be ordered to a hospital for testing.

"Safety and well-being"

While many parents have applauded the school's tough antidrug program, some students question whether it is effective. "In the '80s, I don't think there is anything a school administration can do to stop drug abuse," says Moliken, the Student Congress president. The health classes, he says, are "about as effective as the surgeon general's warning on a package of cigarettes." Students say that the undercover operation merely moved the dealing off campus. But principal Cost says schools must do whatever they can to protect the "safety and well-being of students." And drugs, he says, "are a threat to that safety and well-being."

WHAT TO DO IF YOUR SON OR DAUGHTER GETS HOOKED

How can you tell if your child is on cocaine or other drugs? Experts say there are some specific warning signs. Of course, not all mean that a child uses drugs; adolescence is a difficult time, and a certain amount of erratic behavior is unavoidable. But if any of these signs are present, parents should try to find out if drugs are involved:

Problems in school; unexplained time away from home; a desire for isolation; an increase in spending money or a demand for money as well as unexplained losses of parents' money or jewelry; new friendships, especially with kids the parents never meet; unusual changes in health, grooming or behavior, and an interest in clothes or jewelry identified with drug culture or possession of drug paraphernalia.

What should you do if you find out that your child does use drugs? A parent's first reactions will probably be shock, hurt and guilt, says Thomas Gleaton, executive director of the Parents Resources Institute for Drug Education (PRIDE). "I usually tell parents to take a deep breath, try to relax and understand that this is probably something that can be taken care of," Gleaton says. The next step is education, he says; parents should learn everything they can about the biological effects of drugs and the social pressures that make kids turn to drugs. Then, Gleaton says, a parent can say: "I care too much about you to let you do this to yourself."

Where can you go for more help? Several organizations, some with toll-free 800 phone numbers, provide helpful information for parents. Among them:

Fair Oaks Hospital, 19 Prospect Street, Summit, N.J. 07901 (1-800-COCAINE).

What can parents do to prevent drug use? Experts say parents are still the first and best line of defense. "Parents have to take primary responsibility for their family's education about drugs and what drugs do to their kids," says Joyce Nalepka, president of the National Federation of Parents for Drug-Free Youth. It's not enough merely to tell kids to say "no," Nalepka says—parents have to explain the dangers and give kids mental ammunition to combat often overwhelming peer pressure.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. May we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate majority leader has asked for order. The Chair agrees.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me remind colleagues.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Let me remind my colleagues we are on live radio and not able to hear the Senator speaking.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I cannot hear what is going on.

Mr. President, we cannot hear what is going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will come to order.

The custom is if Senators desire to converse they shall leave the floor of the Senate.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

The Senate resumed consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 225.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the manager of the amendment, the Senator from South Carolina, seek the floor?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio seeks the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does recognize the Senator from Ohio.

AMENDMENT NO. 1660

(Purpose: To provide that no reduction in benefits payable under title II of the Social Security Act may be taken into account for purposes of complying with section 1 of the proposed article)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] for himself, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. MOYNIHAN proposes an amendment numbered 1660.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, strike out lines 16 through 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

" 'Section 3. No reduction in benefits payable under title II of the Social Security Act may be taken into account for purposes of complying with section 1 of this article.

" 'Section 4. The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

" 'Section 5. This article shall take effect for the fiscal year 1991 or for the second fiscal year beginning after its ratification, whichever is later.'.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio may now proceed.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Once again this Presiding Officer would prefer that you make the job of bringing order to the Senate much easier than it appears on my part to be and so I ask that you give the Senator from Ohio the attention which he deserves.

I will defer to the Senator from Ohio if he feels he has the attention of the body. The Chair would feel it is much more orderly now than when he proposed the point of order.

Is the Senator from Ohio ready to proceed?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am ready to proceed, and I do appreciate the cooperation of the Chair.

Mr. President, this amendment is the Social Security amendment. It provides Social Security benefits cannot be reduced to comply with the balanced budget amendment.

I cannot think of anything more important to the senior citizens of this country and I believe to all Americans than the adoption of this amendment. When we passed the Gramm-Rudman Act, we passed it with the understanding that it would not affect Social Security benefits. Therefore, I believe that if we are to be consistent with the passage of that act, we have to provide an exception in connection with the constitutional amendment.

If we do not pass this amendment, we are going to find in future years that the trust funds for Social Security will be increasing, that there will be substantial balances in those trust funds and the suggestion will be, and the urging will be, both from the President of the United States and Congress as well that we impact those Social Security funds in order to balance the budget.

This is not what the senior citizens of this country are entitled to. This is not what they worked all their lives to provide. Our obligation is to see to it that those funds be protected and the only way we can protect those funds is by adopting this amendment to the constitutional amendment.

Absent that, absent our adopting this amendment, the Social Security trust funds of this country will be in jeopardy as far as future increases are concerned in Social Security benefits.

I say to my colleagues, and many of you have stood, you have spoken to the issue of Social Security, if you believe as strongly as I do that the older Americans in this country are entitled to protection, that their funds should not be used in order to balance the budget for defense spending or for any one of a host of other programs, then you have no choice but to adopt this amendment.

Mr. President, I see the senior Senator from Michigan on the floor. It is my understanding that he wishes to address himself to this issue, and I yield the floor to him at this time.

Before he does so, I wish to point out my amendment was offered on behalf of myself, Senator RIEGLE, and Senator MOYNIHAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I want to follow along with the comments of my colleague from Ohio who brings this very important amendment to the floor in behalf of himself, myself, and Senator MOYNIHAN.

The purpose of this amendment is to correct what is a glaring flaw in this proposed constitutional amendment.

The currently drafted Thurmond amendment to the Constitution would actually have the effect of undoing the delicate compromise on Social Security that was reached there only 3 months ago in the Gramm-Rudman legislation.

I might say I think the Social Security understanding and agreement at that time was critical to the ability of the Gramm-Rudman legislation to pass. So to now by any means undo that central aspect of what went on at that time with respect to Social Security is clearly something that ought not to happen.

During that debate on Gramm-Rudman, this Congress, with the President concurring, made the decision to remove Social Security from the Federal budget effective immediately. In fact, that may have been the only good part of Gramm-Rudman. It was the fact that that was nailed down because clearly Social Security being a separate trust fund ought not to be part of the Federal budget. It did not use to be years ago. It was brought into the unified Federal budget I think for the wrong purposes, namely, to disguise the buildup and cost of the Vietnam war. Many of us have been fighting for many years to take Social Security out of the Federal budget so it could stand by itself, be managed and monitored independent of other activities of the Federal Government as is appropriate for something that is independently funded as a Social Security System is.

But if we were to adopt the Thurmond compromise as it has been drafted, the important protection that we won just 90 days ago for the Social Security System would have no meaning. We would be right back into the same problem that we were in before.

That would happen because the current Thurmond amendment says that outlays in any fiscal year shall not exceed receipts and both Social Security benefits and revenues are included in such a formulation.

As a result, in any year, one could propose a reduction in Social Security benefits as a means for achieving the overall balance in the Federal budget as a whole. And that clearly ought not to be the case. That out not to be what is even possible to do.

It is precisely that type of action, which would be motivated solely by budgetary considerations, that Congress was worried about and concerned enough about that we decided that we wanted to take Social Security out from under the budget umbrella so that that threat would not exist and that danger would not be there.

We have accomplished that but this constitutional amendment that is before us now would undo that and take us right back into this previous situation and endanger the Social Security System that I think has to be prevented.

Now, I just want to stress again that the reason why it is inappropriate for us to move in the direction that has been recommended here in the constitutional amendment includes three points.

The first is that Social Security is separately financed through a dedicated payroll tax and, as a matter of fact, the Social Security System is in good financial condition. It is building its financial reserves at the present time as properly it should, so that the money is there in the future to meet and pay the benefits of workers who are now in their working years but later on will retire and be eligible to receive those benefits.

Second, the program Social Security by law is prohibited from ever running a deficit. So, as a matter of fact, we do not have to worry about the Social Security System running a deficit or contributing to some overall notion of a deficit for the Government as a whole because the law will not allow that to happen.

And, in fact, we have to be at least in a balance and preferably in a situation where we are building a surplus in the Social Security System so that we do not need any kind of constitutional action affecting Social Security to provide that kind of protection which is there now.

Third, the surpluses that are accumulating in the Social Security trust funds are actually helping to reduce, if you will, the overall arithmetic of the Federal budget deficit in the aggregate. In fact, the surpluses that are growing in the Social Security System now will be reaching a figure of approximately a $70 billion surplus by the year 1991, which is just 5 years from now.

So there, again, you have a situation where very substantial surpluses are there. And, from an overall bookkeeping or accounting point of view, they have the effect of tending to give the appearance of reducing overall Federal deficits when the Social Security accounts are added in.

So the amendment that we have offered here—the Senator from Ohio, myself and the Senator from New York—is a very straightforward amendment. What it would do is simply preserve the agreement that was reached in the Gramm-Rudman legislation just a short time ago. Our amendment would very simply prohibit reduction in Social Security benefits from being counted for the purpose of complying with the requirements of balancing Federal receipts under a constitutional balanced budget amendment. That would remove Social Security as a target. It would mean that it would not be proper or possible for people to go in and try to raid the Social Security System by cutting down the benefits in any fashion in order to take and create a larger surplus which could then be used as an offset against Federal spending in some other area of the Federal budget.

I would just say to senior citizens and to those who will become senior citizens later across the country, we have seen over the last 5 years a number of attacks directed at the Social Security System by this administration. President Reagan early on recommended the elimination of the minimum benefit under Social Security and then major reductions or eliminations in the annual cost-of-living adjustments for inflation under Social Security and other major Social Security cuts.

In recent years, we have led the fight, those of us who feel strongly that those proposals are wrong, against those kinds of reductions and we have been successful. We have been able to run them off when they have tried to come in and damage Social Security.

But this package, as it is on the floor today, endangers Social Security. And every senior citizen in this country ought to take account of the fact that that kind of risk would be created here if we fail to adopt the amendment that we have just put forward and is at the desk at the present time.

So I hope that everyone here who has understood the nature of this problem and has said in the past that they are willing to see that Social Security is set aside so that it cannot be subjected to an attack to try, in any strange way, to finance or seem to finance other areas of the Federal budget, I hope that they will join with us at this time. It is essential that we pass this amendment. If we do not, I think you will find that there will be a firestorm that will occur out there when the word gets out as to what this new jeopardy would be.

I yield the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, there is hardly any issue of importance that comes around here where someone does not raise the Social Security issue. I believe the purpose of raising it, in all honesty, is to try to obtain political advantage. I think the purpose of it is to keep our senior citizens in constant fear that somebody is going to interfere with their Social Security, and I think it is no exception here.

It is clearly brought up for one reason and that is to try to kill the balanced budget constitutional amendment. The other side is willing to do almost anything in this context to kill the balanced budget amendment. They do not want to put into the Constitution of the United States any kind of restraint on their spending practices which have been going on now without balanced budgets for 26 of the last 27 years. They will use any method, they will use any argument, and they do not care who they scare or who they frighten to make their points.

And I can tell you that a lot of the votes, if you check them, on the last amendment were entered by people who literally normally would not support the position of this administration in national security, or at least with regard to the military. But they voted for it because they knew, with something that broadly written that basically would allow any state of emergency to exist almost any time in the eyes of almost anybody, if that amendment was accepted, it would kill the constitutional amendment to mandate a balanced budget.

Now, that is what is involved here. If they are good amendments, we are going to accept them. But we are fighting for a principle here that literally the American people have wanted for a long time.

The Founding Fathers of this Nation did not want this country to continually have deficit spending. They expected it during times of national emergency and war—maybe during times of severe depression or recession—but not every year after year after year, even during good times. They expected surpluses during good times. They never contemplated in their wildest imagination that they would have a Congress of the United States, or have a succession of Congresses of the United States, that ignores, the will of the American people to the extent these Congresses have over the last 53 years.

So what we are faced with here now is another amendment brought for only one reason, and that is to try to defeat this constitutional amendment to mandate a balanced budget.

Senate Joint Resolution 225 does not jeopardize Social Security in the slightest. We have heard many drastic predictions that Senate Joint Resolution 225 might somehow harm basis social services. These predictions might be justified if Senate Joint Resolution 225 required a balanced budget under all circumstances and if Congress were not free to implement Senate Joint Resolution 225 responsibly.

Let me be perfectly clear. This constitutional amendment could not cause the drastic consequences predicted by the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Michigan. Only Congress can cause those conditions, not this amendment. And it is very unlikely that Congress will be insensitive to the needs of their constitutents and, above all, the needs of the elderly in this society. We have not shown that propensity in the past in either party and I do not think we will show it in the future.

To repeat, Senate Joint Resolution 225 is a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget. It does not harm Social Security in the slightest. It does not change the circumstances affecting Social Security at all.

Under Senate Joint Resolution 225, this amendment to the Constitution, Social Security could only be changed or altered if Congress elected that course, which is an extremely unlikely prospect, and the proponents of this amendment know that. We go through this every time we try to get any budgetary restraint around here. If the conditions described by the Senator from Ohio and/or the Senator from Michigan were even remotely possible under a balanced budget in some future fiscal year, Congress could avert those circumstances or those consequences in many ways. It is important to review those alternatives which clearly leaves Congress in the posture of deciding how to handle difficulties. Thus, Congress, not Senate Joint Resolution 225, would dictate any potential alterations in Social Security.

It is important to note, however, that I cannot imagine a scenario under which Congress is likely to fail to keep its commitments in the Social Security System.

As has been repeatedly mentioned, Senate Joint Resolution 225 will be implemented by legislation. In this legislative implementation, Congress will be free to suggest whatever protections are necessary to prevent any damage to the basic purpose of Social Security.

That will occur if the amendment stays in its present form, but to satisfy the distinguished Senator from Florida, we are willing to take his amendment to require implementing legislation, even though that is implicit in this amendment.

Even in the most desperate economic circumstances, Congress would have alternatives to insure that Social Security is not harmed. Let me list some of those.

Congress could set aside a contingency fund to cover Social Security in the times of economic difficulty that require adjustments under this amendment.

Congress could enact spending rescissions or cuts in less important programs to secure compliance with the ratified Senate Joint Resolution 225 amendment. Congress could by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress enact a tax increase or surtax to comply with Senate Joint Resolution 225. Congress could do any combination of these alternatives to comply with Senate Joint Resolution 225. Moreover, the President could have a role in enforcing this amendment. The President could veto inappropriate spending. He could defer spending in accord with the authority conferred by the 1974 Budget Act, recommend rescissions, or tax increases, or any combination of these alternatives to compliment Congress' compliance actions.

It is important to note that none of these alternatives concerns Social Security at all. It is important to note that I have not yet mentioned the authorization of a specific excess in outlays over receipts by a three-fifths vote yet this would still be a further safety valve.

In the conditions described by the Senator from Ohio, I would fully expect that Congress could muster the consensus to take such a step. This is still a further protection. Although I am confident that nearly all of my colleagues have voted at one time or another to preserve the basic purposes of the Social Security Program, indeed, very few, if any, Senators question the merits of this statutory program. Dealing with specific statutory programs in the context of the Constitution, however, does pose tremendous difficulties.

In the first place, the exemption of a statutory program from the aggregate totals of outlays and receipts under this proposed amendment would mean one of two things, both of questionable merit. It could mean the current Social Security System would be frozen into the Constitution. Congress could lose the ability to adjust the system as population demographics change and whereas needs grow or decline.

Under this reading of this proposed amendment only the current Social Security System would be exempted and any changes in the program would be subject to the budget aggregates of the amendment thus making statutory changes in the program difficult—statutory changes that may be in the best interests of the program.

As is evident, this absence of flexibility can make it nearly impossible for Congress to respond to the needs of future generations to statutory adjustment.

This attempt to constitutionalize a statutory program could be disadvantageous to future beneficiaries of our Social Security System.

Another prospect is that this statutory loophole could also undermine the intent of this amendment. Since the Social Security Program System is a statute it can be changed by a mere majority vote.

Another reading of this proposal might suggest that any statutory adjustments would also be exempt from the Budget Act of Senate Joint Resolution 225; that is, any program could escape the constraints of a balanced budget if it were simply crafted as an amendment to Social Security laws. This could invite rebukes. In the wake of ratification of Senate Joint Resolution 225 any new program, regardless of its content, is likely to be drafted as an amendment to the Social Security laws.

If you want to place them in jeopardy, then follow the lead of the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hesitate to interrupt the Senator. But on this subject, is it the Senator's view that the balanced budget amendment itself would authorize, empower or indeed require a President to impound moneys that exceeded the balanced budget amendment restrictions?

Mr. HATCH. We do not believe that this amendment authorizes any change in the law over existing law at the present time. So whatever the President has the right to do now he would have a right to do in the future. It is clearly not the intent of this amendment however to establish any new authority in the President absent congressional action or to imply any reordering of the separation of powers balance between the branches of the National Government.

So this amendment simply does not invest within the President any new authority over the impoundment of appropriated funds.

Congress, however, may choose in its wisdom to amend existing statutes or impoundment statutes consistent with the Constitution and establish a greater power, if it wants to, in the President to carry out section 1 obligations by impounding funds. That is our right as the Congress, if we want to, and if we choose to do so. But we chose not to require that in this amendment, as the Senator knows.

In the absence of such legislation, it is still expected that the President will exercise his budget proposing authority, his veto authority, and any other authority available to him to carry out the mandate of this section.

Mr. JOHNSTON. So that if the President, for example, thought that all of that money was outlayed in an appropriation bill, he would have no authority to impound for the purpose of complying with the outlay restrictions.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is correct. Under this amendment, he will not have the power to amend it. He will have no further power than he has right now. I might add neither will Congress.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No implied authority at all?

Mr. HATCH. No implied authority at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Senator.

I think his answer was very clear and concise. I hope the legislative record will be absolutely clear on this. I think the Senator's answer makes it clear.

Mr. HATCH. I think we have tried to make it clear. We will continue to do.

Mr. METZENBAUM. If the Senator will yield just 1 minute without the Senator from Utah losing his right to the floor, I believe that there are varying opinions as to what the President's right might be vis-a-vis the question of impoundment.

I do not want that colloquy which occurred between the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Utah to be determinative of what the law is. The Constitution speaks for itself, and a legislative debate does not provide a basis to determine what the Constitution says or means. The only way that will be decided is either by a President acting and somebody challenging him in the courts or in some other way having the issue before the courts.

But I do not want this matter to be brought in such a manner that we will have made history without there being some indication that other points of view are possible.

Mr. HATCH. Let me make this point.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Senator.

I think that is certainly correct. Does the Senator from Utah tell me that all of the sponsors of this amendment and the legislative history thus far would all support his view on the matter?

Mr. HATCH. I am saying that all of the sponsors are in agreement, that there is no new power given to either the President or the Congress by this amendment other than the balanced budget amendment provisions.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No implied power?

Mr. HATCH. And the Judiciary Committee reports that clearly as well.

Let me add one other thing to make it even more clear. I might add that the Congress gets no new powers under this. The President is vested with no new substantive authorities, impoundment, line item vetoes, and so forth, but simply that he is obligated to exercise his excising authority in light of new constitutional directions which this amendment will give him and will give us. He is charged by this sentence with exercising his veto authority, his proposal authority, and his Executive or administrative authority generally in behalf of the new obligations set forth in this amendment.

In other words, he is given no new standards by which to exercise his present authority and no new substantive authority. And I believe every proponent of this amendment agrees with that.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Senator very much for his answer.

Mr. HATCH. If I can finish my remarks with regard to this particular amendment by the Senator from Ohio, in the wake of ratification of Senate Joint Resolution 225 any new program regardless of its content is likely to be drafted as an amendment to Social Security.

That is really a worry to me because that would mean that we could abuse the process even more just by exempting Social Security.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. HATCH. I am happy to yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I am sorry to ask my colleague to yield, but I agree with his opposition to this amendment.

I think it is important that we do not start putting detailed exemptions in this amendment for the same reason that the well-intentioned amendment by our colleague, Senator HEFLIN, was not put in. This amendment should not be adopted because it would put us in the position of having to accept an amendment for the railroad retirees, and an amendment for the Federal Government retirees, and who knows what else.

I happen to be among those who have fought for and will continue to fight for Social Security recipients. I want to keep that program independent. I do not want Social Security to be part of solving the deficit problem. But I do not think it ought to be part of the Constitution.

Mr. HATCH. I believe the distinguished Senator from Illinois agrees with me—that we will all be fighting for that, and that this amendment has one purpose; and, that is, to try to defeat this constitutional amendment.

Mr. SIMON. I think it puts in great jeopardy the whole concept.

Mr. HATCH. Of course.

Mr. SIMON. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. HATCH. I want to thank my colleague for his comments.

Let me say this: If we pass this amendment, every amendment will be brought to the Social Security Act. If you want to jeopardize the elderly, then do it the way the distinguished Senator from Ohio and the distinguished Senator from Michigan are advocating. Start playing around with the Social Security Program, treat it as though it is something completely different from all other budgetary concerns, and put it as an exemption into amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I will yield in a moment. Let me finish my thought in this regard and then I will be delighted to yield to my colleague from Ohio.

I think this type of an approach, when they start drafting amendments to the Social Security bill because it is exempt by the constitutional amendment, amendments which have nothing to do with Social Security, deludes the significance of the Social Security Program in our society. It makes it a catchall bill for new spending programs. It is just another excuse to continue doing what we have been doing all these years.

This might also provoke a backlash damaging the genuine beneficiaries of Social Security. The constraints of Senate Joint Resolution 225 could be circumvented by a majority vote. This would make Senate Joint Resolution 225 operate as we do currently. By a majority vote, any spending could be authorized without any regard.

I realize these two scenarios could not both prevail but either could potentially be damaging both for the purpose of Senate Joint Resolution 225 and for the future beneficiaries of the Social Security System. The reason we cannot be confident about which of these deleterious alternatives is most likely is that a statute has never been incorporated into the Constitution by reference, and it never should be.

The Constitution is not a readily amendable statute itself. That is why we only have 26 amendments to it. That is as it should be. We cannot anticipate all the consequences of such an unprecedented and potentially unwise action as I believe the actions would be of this amendment.

To summarize, Senate Joint Resolution 225 does not jeopardize Social Security under any circumstances. Senate Joint Resolution 225 does not mandate spending cuts or tax increases, or any other specific legislative action. Congress will be responsible to decide how to comply with the mandate of Senate Joint Resolution 225. Thus, Social Security can only be changed if Congress elects to do so, which is no different from current law.

In addition, this amendment takes the unprecedented step of incorporating a statute into the Constitution. The consequences of that action could be damaging both to Congress ability to adjust Social Security to meet future needs and also to the intent of the constitutional amendment.

I really believe that the Senator's amendment is not only dangerous to the Constitution, it is dangerous to Social Security.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Why does the Senator state that adoption of this amendment would somehow jeopardize Social Security? Let me make it clear.

Our amendment specifically provides that Social Security benefits cannot be reduced to comply with the balanced-budget amendment. That is all it is. It is not complicated.

I would like to ask my colleague from Utah, a good friend of mine, how in any way he could come on the floor of the Senate and say that this amendment might jeopardize Social Security. As a matter of fact, it is a fact that the constitutional amendment that he is supporting, without our amendment, would indeed jeopardize the Social Security funds because those funds are going to grow, and as they grow there will be the temptation to dip into them in order to balance the budget. Will he respond?

Mr. HATCH. Social Security, at its present levels, is a potential or it can be used as a catchall statutory item for anybody to add anything onto that they want to, and pork barrel the Social Security Program for other ulterior purposes. It is the wrong thing to do. You do not incorporate statutes into the Constitution. If we start to do that, the Constitution will be left behind. This document which has made us the greatest country in the world will be diminished, demeaned. Frankly, I cannot imagine anybody in this body who wants to hurt Social Security. So why put it into the Constitution?

Mr. METZENBAUM. But you will be hurting it if you pass the constitutional amendment without providing an exclusionary clause.

Mr. HATCH. Not in any way, shape or form. Nothing in this amendment hurts Social Security. The only way Social Security can be hurt is if Members of Congress do it to it and you are doing it to it by trying to add this as a statutory provision to the Constitution. You are doing it because it opens up the Constitution and all the Social Security law to all kinds of amendments. That, I think, is deleterious.

Mr. METZENBAUM. In the past we have made it possible to build up the Social Security funds, and that is just as it should be. As a matter of fact, by the time your constitutional amendment as well as the Gramm-Rudman provision has affected Social Security it will all kick in in the 1991. In 1991 there will be a $6.2 billion surplus in the trust fund.

Mr. HATCH. Let me ask you a question, just to set the record straight. If we accept this amendment, would you become a cosponsor or even vote for the balanced budget amendment?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I believe it is a terrible way to try to run the Government by a constitutional amendment to balance the budget so I would say no. I would further say if you want to balance the budget, you come with me on this floor and do that which we should be doing, vis-a-vis closing tax loopholes, vis-a-vis getting rid of some of the water projects in this country where we provide total subsidization, and doing some of the things we ought to try to do on the floor of the Senate instead of trying to kid the American people that somehow a constitutional amendment will solve that problem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I did vote for the budget that came out of the Senate last time to cut 13 programs. I notice the distinguished Senator from Ohio did not. He did not. It was a chance to really try to trim the budget and get things cut back. I can promise another at least couple of thousand votes——

Mr. METZENBAUM. Was it the fact that the 13 programs included Social Security?

Mr. HATCH. Social Security was not cut. We cut 13 programs. Medicaid and Medicare were not cut. I think the distinguished Senator knows that.

All I can say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio is there is only one reason for this amendment. There is not a person in this body that would cut Social Security from the present benefits, not one.

I can tell you that there is only one reason for this amendment: That is the distinguished Senator from Ohio would not support a balanced budget amendment if his life depended upon it. He would not support a balanced budget amendment for any reason. We both know that. I admire his sincerity in standing up and telling the people of America and the people of Ohio that he does not support a balanced budget.

Mr. METZENBAUM. But will the Senator come on the floor and vote his conscience to see to it that we balance the budget?

Mr. HATCH. I have done it today and I have done it for the last 10 years.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I still have a vote——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. HATCH. I have been doing it for 10 years, and I think my reputation as a fiscal conservative in this body is pretty strong.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is it true that the Senator from Utah failed to vote for a minimum corporate tax?

Mr. HATCH. I will be delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from Ohio if he asks courteously, and I will be happy to answer his questions.

If you compare the record of the two Senators, I have been there on the fiscal conservative votes. The Senator from Ohio is not known for his fiscal conservatism. He is known as one of the important Members of this body and there is no question about it. I have a lot of respect for him. I know he stands up for what he believes. I think he is wrong in almost everything he does, but that does not diminish from his sincerity.

But we are talking about getting this country under control. We are talking about putting into the basic document something that might save this country. We are talking about saying, "Congress, OK, no more excuses because you cannot do everything you want to statutorily."

We are going to put into the Constitution that point and then even liberals can go to their constituencies and say,"I am sorry; I would like to spend more for you, but I have to abide by the Constitution because all of us are sworn to uphold the Constitution."

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr HATCH. Yes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is not the Senator from Utah more liberal than anybody in the Senate as far as protecting corporate loopholes, no minimum tax for corporations? Is it not a fact that the Senator from Utah has no evidence in his record of ever voting that the tax burdens of this country should be shared fairly but, rather, sees to it that the corporations have been protected? Is it not a fact that the Senator, when offered a minimum corporate tax so that some corporations who are making large profits would pay their fair share of taxes, was one of those who were the leaders in opposing that?

Mr. HATCH. Let me say this is not atypical of the distinguished Senator from Ohio. Rather than explain his liberal votes on the floor, he will bring up something like that.

Yes, I am for a minimum corporate tax.

I was not for his corporate tax because like most Members of this body, we do not find fault with what most business does in this country. We believe that business does create the opportunities for people to work.

I might say that corporations do not pay taxes but pass them on to you and me, and every other consumer. We pay the taxes. That is where the distinguished Senator from Ohio misses the vote on many, many issues. He would just as soon hammer the corporations in the country under the guise that he is doing something for the little people when the little people always have to pay for it anyway.

We are off the subject.

Mr. METZENBAUM. You haven't called me a liberal for the last 30 seconds.

I want to tell you, for a right-wing reactionary like you to stand on the floor and be talking in these terms is absurd to me. I say to my colleague that you and I know, we have met on many occasions on various programs, and you know as well as I do that constantly, you refuse to see to it that the American people and the American corporations share the burden.

I have never proposed that we come down with any oppressive taxes. But when 49 corporations in this country make $65 billion and wind up getting $3.5 billion in tax refunds and then you vote against a corporate minimum tax on the floor of the Senate, I think you have some explaining to do to the people of Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I have something to say about those 49 corporations. I think you raise a good point, but the way you raise it in your amendment itself is not very good. I think we should do something, but do it in a good way, not demagog it. I think that is what we do, demagog the issue, because you know there is not a person in this body who is going to hurt Social Security. All you are trying to do is kill this constitutional amendment, which you would not vote for anyway, even if this amendment passes.

Let me yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, this is a fascinating debate. I would not have missed any of it, but I wish I had missed some of it.

Let me say that I am one of the original cosponsors of the balanced budget amendment. I remember so distinctly those early months working with Senator DECONCINI, Senator HEFLIN, Senator HATCH, and Senator THURMOND. The five of us put together the first package. We have had a long road and these gentlemen deserve all the credit—Senator THURMOND, Senator HATCH, Senator HEFLIN, Senator DECONCINI, and now a fine new Member of the body, Senator SIMON of Illinois, who has been an extraordinary participant here.

As an original cosponsor, I remember what we were trying to do. Nothing has changed. We tried to do some things with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. We are doing that by statute. We have a lot more to do, and we do it here, then, through the Constitution.

I must say, Mr. President, I have been here 7 years—and now the American people get to listen in on what we do here. I am pleased about that because it will disclose a rather extraordinary arena in which to work. The driest form of human labor is legislating—if done correctly. If done incorrectly, it just becomes a mish-mash of hype and hoorah. I have said before that you either pass or kill a piece of legislation on this floor by using a very deft blend of emotion, fear, guilt, or racism. Is that not a nice way to do your work? Yes, emotion, fear, guilt, or racism can either pass or kill a bill, using that kind of deft blend of one or all of those issues.

It is very tiresome, very tedious. It is, in many cases, kind of pathetic, because the very easiest thing to do in this city or in this Chamber is just to grab a microphone and get everybody all juiced up. Then it takes thoughtful legislators, Democrats and Republicans, alike, to come along behind those people and police up after them like we do after the Fourth of July parade in Cody, WY. And it gets that deep.

Social Security. Now I tell you, Mr. President, there it is right there. We do not do anything with Social Security but use it as a bomb to roll under the Democrats' chairs or to roll it under the Republicans' chairs, hoping it will go off under them. What a tedious process. It has become an art form to bring up Social Security on everything and anything. And it is $212 billion worth of our budget. How can you ignore it? We are fools to ignore it. So we do not ignore it. We have SSI—supplemental security income—we never touched their benefits or their cost-of-living allowances either. I remember when inflation was 14 percent, nobody complained when their check was increased by 14 percent. But then when inflation went to 3 or 4 percent, they said, "Well, that is not enough, I wanted 8."

We said, "No, no, inflation adjustments were to be the 'cost-of-living.' When it was 14 percent, you got that. Now it is 3.5 percent, you get that."

They said, "Oh, no, that is impossible. We want 8."

Who is saying all that? Well, there are a lot of groups in the United States who get pretty juiced up about Social Security and use it as the bomb. No one suggests reducing benefits. So we left the program and its automatic COLA's off the table. Yet nowhere in the Golden Book of Speeches did anybody find out how you actually leave cost-of-living allowances off the table. We could have saved ourselves about 5.5 or $6 billion if we had left the cost-of-living allowance on Social Security on the budget deficit table, but we could not do that, because the old mail system breaks down when you do that.

I joined the AARP. I am now 54 years old. I wanted to see how they do things there. It only costs $5 to join. The AARP is a good and remarkable organization, the American Association of Retired Persons. They publish a magazine called Modern Maturity, which is much in form like the Smithsonian magazine. It is a pretty jazzy magazine.

All of the editorial comment in that magazine would have you believe that somehow everybody over 65 is foraging in an alley or eating out of a garbage can. How absurd. Then their advertising package—the one that they send to the folks who they want to put in their ads in their magazine, says, "If you want to get the biggest bang for your buck, advertise in Modern Maturity, because you are then directing your ad to the most affluent sector of American society."

Is that not fascinating? Absolutely fascinating. And the ads in the magazine show some of the sleekest gray-haired cats you have ever seen—playing tennis, and the ads have to do with cruise ships, where you can go, how you can get a discount here or there and fly or cruise the world. That is great. I am going to enjoy that in my later years. I am going to pay my dues continually and I am going to enjoy those trips. But for heaven's sake, you cannot have it both ways.

You cannot have a system that pays 3 bucks out for every buck you pay in and pretend it works. It is not actuarially sound. I do not care what is in the Social Security trust fund right now. It does not matter what is in it. We have been told what is in it for decades and we have never come out on the right end. It never will. Come the year 2020 and we will look like we fell off a cliff when the baby boomers begin to drag the fund's surpluses down. That is a troubling thing.

We do not do anyting with Medicare, either; $70 billion this year, but that is off limits. We do not touch that because the mailroom breaks down. The 200 billion bucks in Social Security, and $70 billion in that. We do not touch either of them—none of them. We do not put any "means-test" on Medicare. Many people on Medicare are well able to take care of their own health care expenses.

How do we get to a place in this country where everybody over 65 is supposed to be in deep fiscal trouble, especially when we are compassionate and put together an SSI package to take care of those people with real problems? How did we get to the point where everybody who is ever sick and not in a catastrophic illness should have the Government pay for it? Remember the original construction of the Medicare Program? The funding was supposed to be 50 percent from the beneficiary and 50 percent from your Government. Right now, the Government pays 76 percent and the beneficiary pays 24 percent. We tried to change that 1 percentage point last year and the mailroom broke down. That is because "the juicers" were out doing their work. A fascinating business.

We either pay attention to Social Security and make it actuarially sound or do something else with it, because in the year 2020, it will be chaotic. If we do not do something with the inordinate pressure from the senior citizens interest groups, usually on the issue of Social Security, then—get this—in the year 2020, 60 percent of our domestic budget will be directed to people over 65 years of age.

Whoever had in mind—in any kind of a society—that the old people should take the Government's resources and the young people should keep providing for them and not get their own return when the time comes?

Now, that is where we are headed, as long as we continue to hear the great hype and the hoorah about Social Security.

Take a look at veterans' benefits. How did we ever get to the point in this country where somehow we are to believe that every veteran is somehow "disadvantaged"? Well, that is offensive to me totally. I gave 2 years of military service to this Government, and I do not remember them telling me anything about what I was going to get. Now they say, "Well, we gotta know what we are going to get before we go in."

I served at the end of the Army of Occupation in Germany and was very proud to do that, I got the GI bill and loved it, but I do not remember any promises. Nowadays it is all promises. And if you touch the veterans' budget, I mean they march out over the parade ground and do the sword trick on you. I have heard and seen that one, too. And yet there are millions of veterans who served less than 6 months, never left the United States, were not involved in any kind of activity combatwise, and who draw every single benefit that a combat veteran draws. Try to change that. Oh boy. The mailroom breaks down because the juicers are out juicing up the troops. Fascinating, really fascinating.

Then you can be a disabled American veteran by crushing your knee on a ski slope in Vail when you are stationed at Fort Carson and be a service-connected disabled veteran.

I am not saying that to get people all up in arms. I am saying it because it is true. I say—let us direct the veterans resources of this country to the combat theater service-connected disabled, their widows and orphans and then make priorities for stateside service-connected disabled and non-service-connected disabilities, and down the list. And I would not even be saying these things if we were not faced with things like the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction package.

I notice that every time we get into an emotional debate on veterans here, I do not hear our most respected colleagues DANNY INOUYE, or LLOYD BENTSEN, or BOB DOLE, or STROM THURMOND in the debate. They are men who fought overseas and some left pieces of their anatomies on various foreign shores. The debate is usually often participated in by Senators who are not even veterans, and I will tell you that is offensive to me because they just get in it to juice up the troops, and the rest of us have to come along and do it thoughtfully.

I asked a professional veteran member of a veterans' service organization, "What is it you want?" They said, "Well, if we trash them long enough they'll go along." They trashed Max Cleland. He left three pieces of his anatomy in Vietnam. He could not "pass the test" and they tried to drum him out of the corps. Bob Nimmo was in three wars for his country and they had him drummed out of the corps. You cannot satisfy them. You say, "Why do you do that?" And they say, "To get that old membership up. Don't you understand? That's our job. We've got to get the membership up."

So here I am as a "Veteran of Foreign Wars." I am fiercely proud of that. That is an impressive title to me and I am very proud to have been in Germany, but I was there in 1955. I do not remember a live round every whistling by my head in combat. And of those 29 million veterans, maybe 3 million of us ever had a live round whistle by our head in combat. And I say wherever they were or whatever theater, give them the works, anything they need. But, for heaven's sake, every time we raise the issue of looking at the veterans' programs the mailroom breaks down.

We talk about anybody over 65, the mailroom breaks down. Anybody on Medicare, the mailroom breaks down. So we have effectively set aside about 70 percent of the budget that we do not touch at all while we are going through this ghastly exercise of trying to get the budget deficit under control.

Fascinating business. At least the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings plan—and God bless the three sponsors of it—will make us revisit the issue. Next year we will say, "We cannot leave Social Security COLA's out of the mix. We cannot leave Medicare out of the mix. We cannot leave non-service-connected disability payments and compensation, and on and on and on, out of the mix. We have to address it all. We cannot leave the COLA's out of the mix." That is where we are in this country.

I am very pleased that now at least the American people can tune in on the radio and hear how it really is—that everytime you get to a serious issue, somebody throws in something that has to do with emotion, fear, guilt, or racism, and pretends that they are about doing "the Nation's business." I must admit that I do a little of it myself. I do not leave myself out of the equation. I am not that kind. But I tell you, when you deal with issues like I have on immigration reform, and nuclear regulation, and veterans, and agent orange, you finally get to where you see Moon from both sides. I think that it would be well if the American people will tune in and listen to the juicers and the guys that love to hype it up and hoorah it, because it takes no brains at all to be a critic. No experience is necessary. If you really want to get something done, well, then, get in and legislate and do a little of the hard work in the hearings and the compromises and the amending like a lot of thoughtful Democrats and Republicans do.

It seems to me in my assessment that of the 100 of us here, about 85 of us came here to work and about 15 came here to raise hell, and they do it often and well and extraordinarily. I think it is time, and I am pleased that the American public can tune in to hear it, and maybe begin to identify who they are.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. DECONCINI and Mr. EVANS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I will not be long, but I want to thank Senator SIMPSON for his, as usual, very candid remarks about how this place operates. Although he and I may differ on issues, indeed he is correct on a number of things in his observations. One is that he was one of the original sponsors of this latest effort. I know Senator THURMOND would consider he has been the original sponsor. From probably the time that the Senator from Wyoming and I were still in college, he was working on it. But we did start to move toward bringing it to the floor when the Senator and I and Senators HATCH and HEFLIN and THURMOND got together. I appreciate his remarks on it because it has been a long, hard road and he has played an important part.

The Senator points out the so-called juicers. I do not find it as critical as he does. Whether I agree with him or not, I think it is part of the process. I do agree with the Senator that I think it is important for the American public to have an opportunity to listen to all of this because some if it borders on the ridiculous, in my judgment. I am sure other Members will have their own thoughts about what is really important here.

I want to just say that although the Senator from Wyoming and I have a different feeling on some veterans issues, indeed there are special interest groups that whip up their membership and bring it to various Members here, and that does not offend me. It does, of course, when I do not agree with them on the issue. But it does not offend me to have that process. I think it is important that the Senator from Wyoming so candidly explained how it works, because what he says is right. That is how it works. I am not sure that that is all bad, but he spelled it out. He peeled it open. And now we are faced with an amendment to this constitutional amendment dealing with that favorite subject of all of us, and that is Social Security.

I do not chide the Senator from Ohio or perhaps the Senator from Michigan who is going to talk on this. If anybody stood up for Social Security, certainly they have. But I have, too, and so have most Members in this body. Nobody in my opinion has really forsaken or abandoned the Social Security recipient here. The purpose of the amendment before us today, which now is being amended by the Senator from Ohio, is not to jeopardize Social Security one iota. And you can even make an argument that it may make it stronger. But to stand here and raise that threat—as the Senator from Wyoming said, get the juices flowing and get the senior citizens here concerned about this is going to not provide for their protection—is nonsense.

I agree with the Senator from Wyoming that it is once again being used as a tool. And I stand shoulder to shoulder with my colleague from Ohio in consistently supporting the Social Security system, exempting it from the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation. The Senator from Michigan has been one of the stalwarts here, and I will always admire his willingness to come out here and fight for the Social Security system. But this is not a Social Security fight. This involves whether or not we want to put statutory language, Gramm-Rudman language in a constitutional amendment. I do not think that is wise, nor do I think it is necessary. If we did do that, are we not inviting ourselves then to say, "Well, then, what other real important priorities are there?"

What about veterans? Should veterans' retirements be excluded from such a constitutional amendment? How about research on AIDS, something that has really stricken this country? Shall we take that out? Or military disability payments, or Federal retirees' payments in the retirement program? How about the railroad retirees? There is a group that pretty well sustains itself through its program. Should they not be excluded, as is the proposal by the Senator from Ohio? I do not think so.

I do not think that by saying, "No, they should not be excluded from this constitutional amendment," it in any way means that Congress is not going to protect the Social Security recipients or the railroad retirees or continue our commitment to research in AIDS or some other area.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. I appreciate the Senator yielding. He is always very kind in that regard, and I appreciate the kind reference he made to this Senator a short time ago.

I have been listening very carefully to what the Senator has been saying. It seems to me that we are making a change here, and this proposed amendment to the Constitution introduces economic policy in the form of a balanced budget, to the Constitution in a new way. That is why the Senator is offering it.

It seems to me that if we are going to insert an economic policy matter into the Constitution this way, something as fundamental as whether the Social Security Trust Fund should be in or out of that formulation is a related question. It is not as if it is an extraneous question.

When you raise the issue of economic policy and a Federal budget policy, the question of whether or not Social Security Trust Funds should be in or out seems to me to be a logical question that follows from the very recommendation the Senator is making.

So I feel that we are not raising the Social Security issue out of the thin air. It relates to the proposition that the Senator brought to us here on the floor today.

All I want to do is to try to make it clear that we will set Social Security to the side, that it will not be a target for cutting under this constitutional amendment. I do not see why that should not be acceptable. I should think that people on the Senator's side of the argument would be prepared to accept that, because I hear everybody saying, "We don't intend to cut Social Security." If that is the case, why not accept this amendment? It is only one sentence. It makes sure that, in the future, we have not put a loophole in here that gets used for a bad purpose, a purpose the Senator does not want and I do not want.

Mr. DECONCINI. Let me respond in a couple of ways to the Senator's question.

Let us first assume that his agrument is valid, that this is an economic decision, and for that purpose historically we have always protected the Social Security System. I say I want to protect it, and everybody says they want to protect it, and why not put it in the amendment? It seems to me you are then faced with the question of what do you do with other important programs, just as important as Social Security programs?

First, I think that once you start to do that, Social Security or not Social Security, it should not be in here.

Second, as to it being an economic issue, it seems to me that the economic issue here is very clear. It is not what is going to be included or excluded. It is merely that this Government is not going to adopt a balanced budget without a three-fifths vote. That means that something as important as Social Security, if in fact we had it funded through some other means, would take a greater majority vote to do it. If we were going to do it with deficit dollars, if we were not going to raise the Social Security tax to pay for benefits and increased COLA's out of general revenues, which has been proposed here before, then it would take a three-fifths vote. Or, if we were going to raise a tax, it would take a three-fifths vote.

That is economic policy that, in my judgment—and the Senator from Michigan and I may disagree on that—is distinct from including or excluding, as the amendment of the Senator from Ohio says—excluding Social Security from this umbrella of trying to get a balanced budget.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. I yield.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator for yielding.

I just make this point: As the Senator well knows, we have had proposals made each year now for the last 4 years to cut Social Security, to cut the COLA's under Social Security, or to cut other aspects of Social Security. I have fought very hard against those, as the Senator knows, and Members are divided on that. We have had several pitched battles in the Senate over that question for the last 4 years running.

That was the history that led up to the decision in the Gramm-Rudman legislation to finally agree in law that we would take Social Security out of the budget because it is financed with a separate tax and separate trust fund and has certain separate legal obligations, and we would put it off to the side, we would not treat that under the broad umbrella of the Federal Government's budget. We just settled that in the Gramm-Rudman vote here, roughly 90 days ago, and the President signed it into law, so he presumably agreed with that proposition.

So what our amendment does is simply state that again, because the constitutional amendment here threatens to undo that protection, because it leaves it open, it leaves it ambiguous.

We have just gone through this long history of all these fights against cuts in Social Security, which the American public, by overwhelming numbers, do not want. When people are asked, they state clearly that they do not think Social Security should be cut that way. So, having just taken the step in Gramm-Rudman to provide the protection, 90 days later this issue is going to be raised, although it is not the Senator's intention. If we do not put this protection in here, we are wide open to another attack, and this could be back on the chopping, block, and I do not think we should see that happen.

Mr. DECONCINI. I will say why I think it is not a good idea.

This Senator will proclaim to the world that no one has fought harder than the Senator from Michigan, and I have joined him on those votes, standing up under not the best of circumstancs sometimes.

Mr. RIEGLE. I appreciate that.

Mr. DECONCINI. I agree with the Senator from Michigan that this effort caused the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings proposal to set Social Security aside, or at least to exempt it from the cuts. It does not mean that, under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, Congress could not pass a change in the Social Security system, cut out education benefits, give only half a COLA. They could still do that. But the Gramm-Rudman automatic cuts will not do it, and I think that is wise.

As to the constitutional amendment, it appears to this Senator that, No. 1, this amendment does not speak to Social Security, nor does it speak to research in cancer or AIDS or military retirees or anything else, nor should it. This is an umbrella that we are trying to put out for the country in the highest law of this land. Why should we take any program, whether it is defense expenditures for those who want the MX missile or SDI, or whether it is the railroad retirees, or Social Security, and say we are never going to look at this program? We may want to add benefits or reduce benefits. Who knows what we are going to do?

We took care of that under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, that we are not going to cut it in automatic cuts. That is what would happen if this amendment were here and there was a budget before us.

If there was a deficit and if deficits are particularly directed toward Social Security, the votes are here. The votes have been here to protect Social Security, for the most part. This Senator and the Senator from Michigan would be there.

So, to me it is not necessary, and it is no affront to the Senator from Michigan that the proponents of this amendment are opposed to this constitutional amendment process. I do not think anybody questions that. I cannot help but wonder why it is brought here under these circumstances, because I think if it were put on here, it would weaken the possibility of this amendment passing, not enhance it.

I would love to be corrected and have the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Michigan say, "No, by gosh—if the Senator from Ohio's amendment is adopted, I am going to be a believer, and I will support a balanced budget amendment." But I have yet to hear that argument.

The question arises, in all sincerity, what is the purpose of this amendment?

Mr. REIGLE. I appreciate what the Senator from Arizona has said. I would say that this amendment, if it is adopted, would solve one of the major defects in the constitutional amendment, at least so far as this Senator is concerned.

I think the threat to Social Security has been real and we have had to fight many fights on over the past 5 years here. I think the jeopardy increases dramatically if we pass this constitutional amendment that the Senator brought to us here as is without the perfecting amendment that I and others here have offered. I think it is going to put Social Security right back up there as a nice big juicy target. And there are people around here, and the Senator from Arizona knows it, who are just dying to cut Social Security. The Senator from Arizona is not and I am not, but there are some here who are.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, is it not a juicy target all the time? Has it not been a juicy target before Gramm-Rudman? Is it not likely to be a juicy target?

Mr. RIEGLE. To some people it has been, but we have been in a stronger position to fight it off.

Finally, it culminated in a major achievement in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, where finally we won a victory where Social Security was not only taken out from the point of view of any of the automatic cuts under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings but also it forbids in the language of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings for Social Security accounts to be considered in the budgetary calculations. It went farther than just the automatic cuts.

That was a very major policy breakthrough that we finally achieved and, as I say, President Reagan signed that law. So it is not just something Congress passed. We were all in that situation.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, will the Senator just yield for a quick question?

Mr. RIEGLE. Sure.

Mr. DECONCINI. As far as Social Security, as it stands now, is it not still subject to President Reagan, as he has done in the past, to send up reductions here in the Social Security System? Is that not true?

Mr. RIEGLE. Of course, he can do that.

Mr. DECONCINI. So it is still a juicy target if anyone wants to be against it.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, if you will, I think that strengthens the argument that I am advancing, namely that, you know, we are not altering the fundamental laws in terms of what Congress or the President can propose or want to do, and so forth.

But what you are doing here, I am afraid, unwittingly is you are creating a discipline and by stepping back over the line and putting Social Security back in on the same footing as everything else, even though it gets its own separate financing and its own separate trust funds, by putting it back in on the same footing with everything else in the Government even though it is far different. You are subjecting it to the jeopardy that we fought against for 5 years to remove it from and you are creating a new pressure.

I think what is going to happen is people will come in here and say we have to cut Social Security because the constitutional amendment to balance the budget that has now been ratified by the States says we have to balance the budget. There was a debate on the floor on Social Security way back when—namely now in 1986—and Congress did not, and the Senate at that time, did not go ahead and make this exclusion for Social Security and, therefore, we have to cut Social Security.

I can just hear the people saying that. They will be in here saying it and you and I are going to have to fight them off.

Mr. DECONCINI. And I will join with the Senators, I am sure.

Let me make this statement: Take the argument that the Senator from Michigan offers, and I know the Senator from Michigan is a leader in this area, and he also is very strong for national defense. I do not know anyone in this body who is for a weak national defense. Certainly, the Senator from Michigan has been interested in that as was pointed in the record and the votes, and what have you.

If national defense is one of the No. 1 important thesis of Government, and I think it is, why should not we take national defense out of this amendment and say, "Hey, we should not have this here, because, by gosh, this is too important to have as a juicy target to reduce. It is in the amendment."

Mr. RIEGLE. I would say to the Senator that I think defense falls into a very urgent category of its own for a different reason. But the defense budget is not financed with the separate payroll tax. If it were, I would make the same argument. I would say you have to deal with that account with its own separate funding sources, and whether you are funding it with a surplus or however you are building up your reserves in that account, that is a separate matter.

In the Social Security Trust Fund, this money does not belong to the Government. This money belongs to the American people. They are putting the money in. It is for their retirement.

Mr. DECONCINI. That is right.

Mr. RIEGLE. We ought to keep our cotton-picking hands off it.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, no one is putting their cotton-picking hands on the Social Security funds by the fact that this amendment is before us.

Mr. RIEGLE. It makes it easier.

Mr. DECONCINI. I dispute the Senator. It does not make it easier at all.

Mr. RIEGLE. That is where the difference lies. I think it makes it easier and I think it is going to invite the same kind of attacks on Social Security we have every year for the last 5 years.

I thought we solved this problem 3 months ago with the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings prohibition and having Social Security as a target.

But this reintroduces it, and I can tell you the people want to dip into those Social Security funds in effect by either lowering the benefits, and thereby increasing the surpluses, or in some other way inflating some other area of Government spending and hide it behind the surpluses in the Social Security system. I am telling you based on the experience we have seen I think it becomes more likely here.

I think the American people want us to protect the Social Security system. They want it off to the side. It is their money that we are supposed to be here helping to provide a protection so it cannot be tampered with, and that is all this amendment does. I would think 100 people could vote for it.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RIEGLE. Of course.

Mr. DECONCINI. I appreciate the Senator's disagreement in this area. I cannot indicate that I could not more strongly be in disagreement with him, though I have supported him and will support him in the protection of the Social Security system, and I agree that this is a juicy target and probably will be as the defense budget.

But to me this amendment before us does not affect or touch the Social Security system and it is really I think very questionable that we are here debating Social Security on a constitutional amendment. It has no bearing whatsoever.

I regret that those who may be listening to this debate and this amendment outside are going to be so frightened once again that Congress is doing something to Social Security.

We are not doing anything here to Social Security. The distinguished Senators from Michigan and Ohio know that as well as I do.

I do want to say, Mr. President, on a slightly different topic, there was a colloquy here between the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Utah on the impoundment provisions. I sat and listened to most of it, and I concur with the conclusion as one member of the committee. This does not give any implied authority whatsoever to the President for impoundment.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, going back on Social Security, is defeated because it is just not in the subject matter here, in my judgment, and it is posing a question to the American public, those on Social Security and those who may want to be on it, that once again Congress is tinkering with the Social Security funds.

That is nonsense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is recognized.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, let me be brief. In fact, I would not have spoken at all on this amendment if I had not listened with some interest to the comments first of the Senator from Utah and the exchange between the Senators from Utah and Ohio.

We heard a lot of talk about extreme liberals and rightwing radicals, and then I listened to a long discourse from my colleague from Wyoming about juicing and the legislative process.

Let me say to this body that I, for one, will not shrink to any other Member of this body in terms of working toward and having experience with balanced budgets. I have not served in this body very long, but I will say, as I have said earlier in this debate, that no Member of this body has ever submitted more balanced budgets, signed more balanced budgets, and worked for more balanced budgets, than this Senator in the 12 years I served as Governor.

I have voted for and worked as hard as I could for every one of the budget reduction measures during the last several years and was and am now an enthusiastic supporter of the Gramm-Rudman concept. And I think it is wrong indeed to suggest that those who object to this constitutional amendment somehow are slackers in terms of balanced budgets and that they do not care about the people of this country. I think that is just simply a wrong assumption and it does not deserve the kinds of arguments that we have heard on the floor of this Senate.

But let us face it. The balanced budget amendment, as I said yesterday, does not give courage to a cowardly lion as happened in the Wizard of Oz. A balanced budget amendment simply is a crutch. It is a crutch to attempt to supplant courage, common sense, brains, and the ability of this body and the other House to put together responsible budgets for this country.

I have watched the proponents of this amendment wiggle and squirm and have great difficulty today. First in objecting to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, that would suggest that military emergencies do not always come with the declaration of war and, in fact, very rarely come with the declaration of war since World War II. But that was turned down by a narrow margin.

Now, the suggestion in opposition to this amendment is that Social Security will not be touched, will not be affected. It seems to me that each time an amendment is suggested, the response is that, "Well, it will not hurt in terms of the military, it will not hurt in terms of Social Security, it will not hurt at all."

One of two things are true: Either the amendment is effective and it does mean something and it will introduce restraints beyond those which we now have, or it does not mean anything. And if it does not mean anything, it does not deserve the week we have spent on debate. And if it does mean something, then these amendments have some merit, at least to be discussed, debated honestly and ultimately voted upon.

I have heard time after time the proponents of this amendment suggest, in answer to many of the propositions raised, the emergencies and the potential problems that could come up in the future, saying that, "Well, the votes will be there. If there is a 60-percent requirement, obviously the Congress will respond." And yet they turn right around and say, "We need this balanced budget amendment to the Constitution because the Congress has not responded, because they have not done the job."

You cannot have it both ways. Either the Congress is going to be responsible and has been responsible and will be responsible or, if irresponsible in the past and irresponsible in the future, a constitutional amendment will not prevent irresponsibility.

Perhaps if that is the concern, that the Congress will be irresponsible in the future, then maybe we ought to consider whether some restrictions be placed in that constitutional amendment as to where and how we can shrink that budget to make it fit Cinderella's slipper.

Mr. President, I think it is time to vote on this amendment. I think it is time to vote on the constitutional amendment that is being presented itself. I think the issue is clear. The debate has occurred. It is time to have this Senate make up its mind and express its opinion.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There appears to be a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I will vote against this amendment, and that is why I want it to be clear on what a vote against this amendment really signifies. A vote against this amendment is not a vote to cut Social Security benefits. But if at some point in the future there is a cut in Social Security COLA's, for instance, then it is only fair that such a cut, and the sacrifice by the elderly who would bear it, should be recognized as contributing to deficit reduction. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio were to pass, then it would be impossible to acknowledge, in terms of the deficit, that sacrifice by the elderly of this Nation. That is why I am opposing this amendment.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to commend the able Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI] for the manner in which he has answered the distinguished Senator from Michigan and the distinguished Senator from Ohio on this amendment. I also wish to thank the distinguished Senator from Illinois for the fine manner in which he has handled his response to this amendment, and the able Senator from Utah. I think all of them have answered this amendment amply.

But I just want to mention this point. This amendment can be answered in one sentence. We should not exempt any program from the dictates of this constitutional amendment. There are a lot of programs very worthy—it has been mentioned here disabled veterans—and I could go on and on with others. If we go to exempting one program, there will be efforts to exempt other programs and the constitutional amendment will amount to nothing.

Mr. President, the claim has been made that the balanced budget constitutional amendment is a backdoor effort to attack the programs of the elderly. This claim is purely and simply untrue.

I happen to be a senior citizen myself. But if I were not, I would certainly stand for the senior citizens. They have given their life, they have raised families, they have run the services of the country, and I do not think any right-thinking person wants to harm our elderly citizens.

This constitutional amendment is needed today to ensure the future economic security of our Nation. Balanced Federal budgets, and the health of the economy which will result from such budgets, will benefit all of our citizens, regardless of age. I do not know of any group it will help more than the elderly people, because they are on fixed incomes. And if we do not do something about this debt which is now over $2 trillion, interest rates will go back up, taxes will go back up, and the elderly will be hurt worse than any other group I know, especially from the standpoint of inflation.

Nothing in Senate Joint Resolution 225 requires any particular program to be reduced or affected in any way. The decision of how to balance the budget is left totally in the hands of the Congress and the President, just as it is now.

My colleagues are aware that the recently-passed Gramm-Rudman-Hollings balanced budget statute excluded Social Security and a number of other programs from its mandates. Under Senate Joint Resolution 225, Congress would retain the power it exercised in that statute to exempt a program from spending reductions or spending freezes. Such a program would, of course, continue to be included in the calculation of outlays and receipts.

Mr. President, this constitutional amendment is intended to require Congress to establish budget priorities. It would be highly inappropriate to establish those priorities, however meritorious though they may be today, in the Constitution. This is no place to establish priorities, to put them in the Constitution. Future Congresses must remain unrestrained in their ability to address the priorities of their time.

I, therefore, urge defeat of this proposal and any proposal which seeks to exclude any particular program from the mandates of the balanced budget amendment.

We have not balanced this budget but once in 26 years. If people believe in fiscal responsibility, now is the time to show it. Now is the time to show the people back home that we do want to take care of the finances here in Washington in a responsible manner, which has not been done for the last third of a century almost. We balanced the budget once in the last 26 years; only twice in the last third of a century.

What individual or what corporation can stay in business that handles its business in such a way as that? No individual can do it. No corporation can do it. And this Government cannot keep on doing it.

We have gone too long now without taking steps. Now is the time, today is the date. Let us pass this constitutional amendment and keep off all these extraneous matters and do not try to exempt this group or that group or this class or that class. Let us leave that to the Congress and the President, where it belongs.

Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. D'AMATO). Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] to table the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM]. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

NOT VOTING—1

Goldwater

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 1660 was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WEICKER. I will, Mr. President. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. MATHIAS. Let me ask the Senator from Connecticut what his opinion of the constitutional responsibility of Congress is and its constitutional relationship with the President.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, article 1, section 1 states: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives."

Article 1, section 8 states:

The Congress shall have the powers to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all the duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Congress clearly has the constitutional duties and the necessary constitutional power to carry out those duties.

Article 1, section 7, clause 2:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and the House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

The Constitution is clear about the duties, clear about the powers and here in section 7, clear about the relationship between the Congress and the President. The power to appropriate for the defense and general welfare rests with the Congress, to be ratified by the President, not to be dictated by economic statistics.

Mr. MATHIAS. If the Senator from Connecticut will yield for a further question, one of the principal arguments which is made in favor of this amendment is that in the view of some people—and specifically the proponents of the amendment—the Congress of the United States is paralyzed, that it cannot act. They say only an amendment to the Constitution can correct this inherent flaw in the Constitution, which is to grant to politicians the power to spend without constraint.

Mr. WEICKER. If there is one great untruth in this debate, it is the notion that the Constitution of the United States is flawed. Those who pursue this argument claim the legislative branch of the United States has no incentive but to spend. Anyone who acts otherwise with the finances of the United States is seen by these critics to be somehow irrational under our system of Government. In effect, this argument says the Constitution created and maintained corruption, the spoils of which go not to the greedy, but rather to every Senator and Representative who faithfully executes his duties under the Constitution. This is a cynical argument. We can talk about the retreat of Congress in the face of tough budget choices, or even its surrender. But it is hypocrisy to blame the erosion of congressional guts on the Constitution. That document is crystal clear about fiscal authority. In the same manner, it is crystal clear about the tenure of Senators and Congressmen, all of whom can be thrown out of office on a regular basis if they fail to do their jobs.

Mr. MATHIAS. I ask the Senator from Connecticut, as many people have asked in this debate, What in his view is the harm of automatically blocking the possibility of deficit spending?

Mr. WEICKER. To my good friend, the Senator from Maryland, I say this Nation is not well served when Congress goes on automatic pilot. We have plenty of experience with this business of replacing decisionmakers by economic statistics. For years, the great transportation need in much of the United States, especially in the Northeast, was for highways. And so, the Highway Trust Fund was set up and put beyond the reach of Congress and the appropriations process. And so, on automatic pilot, this money was to be used for highways and highways alone. Now, in the Northeast, we have the greatest highway system in the world and we are far behind in the area of providing mass transit. Once the automatic pilot was turned on, the needs of Connecticut, the needs of the Northeast over time meant nothing.

My understanding is that no State has passed a call for a constitutional convention in more than 2 years. Is it the impression of the Senator from Maryland that there is a growing sentiment in the States and their legislatures that a constitutional convention is a dangerous and unnecessary way to achieve a balanced budget?

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the call for a constitutional convention was one of those ground swells of passing opinion that was ridden very effectively for a time by some well organized lobbying groups—single-issue groups, if you will. However, in their calls to change the Constitution, they failed to carefully examine what was already in the document. The Constitution already contains all the power needed to responsibly deal with the budget deficit. We have the power, we have the authority, to balance the budget today. Even the proponents of this amendment agree that the Congress already has all the necessary power to achieve this result.

Fortunately, there is a strong and growing realization of this simple fact in the States. In September 1984, a committee of the Michigan Legislature failed by one vote to report out a balanced budget constitutional amendment resolution. The one vote was cast by a veteran Republican legislator. I think its important to repeat the reasons for this courageous woman's vote. She said, "I realized I don't want the Constitution tampered with. Congress has all the tools and powers to act and it has not acted." That really very simply is the point. There is nothing wrong with the Constitution. What is required is effective action by Congress and the President to bring some order to our fiscal policy to reduce these deficits. Unfortunately, we have not found any way yet in our history as a Nation to mandate common sense. That is what is required.

Mr. WEICKER. The proponents have suggested that the Federal courts would not become involved in enforcing the provisions of this amendment. The individuals would lack standing to challenge particular spending and taxing measures in the Federal courts.

Mr. MATHIAS. If the Judiciary Committee was correct that citizens do not have standing to enforce the provisions of this amendment in court, then I would submit to the Senator from Connecticut it would have to be self-enforcing or else we have to admit that it is simply not enforceable. Therefore, it may or may not achieve the goal of a balanced budget. Failure to enforce this amendment could I think erode respect for other provisions of the Constitution and for all law.

It is a curious thing that many of those who are supporting this constitutional amendment are among those who speak out most actively against judicial activism, those who are against the intervention of Federal judges into the political and social life of the country, those who question the President's nominees for the Federal bench, who say, "Are you a judicial activist? If you are, we may not want to confirm you." Yet, this balanced budget amendment is simply an invitation to judicial activism.

Let me give the Senator just one example. The Subcommittee on Patents, Copyrights, and Trademarks, of which I am a member, is working on legislation that affects the fees charged by the Patent and Trademark Office for various services—patent applications, trademark registrations and that kind of thing. Basically, this is a noncontroversial bill. However, under this proposed amendment I would suggest that this bill would have to be passed by a rollcall vote and absolute majority of the membership of both Houses since these fee changes might result in some minimal increase in Federal revenues. If the bill were passed in any other way, the individuals affected by these fee schedules might well sue in Federal court. Surely in that case they would have standing. So we will have to be very careful in this Chamber and in the other body. Noncontroversial bills that have even a very modest revenue impact, that might result in $1 additional entering the Federal Treasury, will have to be passed by formal rollcall votes and will require absolute majorities. Now, I do not think there will be a problem necessarily in getting those majority votes, but I just cite this as an example of the concern that we may find an increasing amount of time devoted to rollcall votes in the Senate on basically noncontroversial matters simply to satisfy a requirement of the Constitution that all revenue measures be voted on in this way and receive a majority of the membership of each body. I cannot imagine any real revenue raising legislation passing without a record vote, and I cannot see the necessity for including such a provision in the Constitution. This again really seems to me to be a public relations ploy rather than a thoughtful or necessary change in the constitutional system.

Now, if the Senator from Connecticut will yield for just one last time, let me say that there has been discussion on this floor about fiscal problems connected to this amendment. I am wondering what the Senator's view is as to what the amendment will do to our ability to respond to crises and opportunities in a timely manner?

Mr. WEICKER. Only our ability to spend in anticipation of greater savings has enabled us to respond to certain problems in the Nation, especially, as an example, a serious disease like AIDS. Dr. Myron Essex, chairman of the Department of Cancer Biology at the Havard School of Public Health said the following in an interview published in the New York Times magazine last Sunday:

> The Centers for Disease Control has been trying to inform the public without overly alarming them. But we outside the Government are freer to speak. The fact is that the dire predictions of those who have cried doom ever since AIDS appeared haven't been far off the mark. There isn't just one AIDS virus but a score that we know of—and countless others, because it mutates at a hundred times the rate of other viruses. So, making an effective vaccine will be extremely difficult. The effects of the virus are far wider than most people realize. In Zaire, Zambia, and Rwanda, it's been spreading rapidly by means of heterosexual intercourse; in Rwanda as many women as men have AIDS. And infected women are giving birth to infected babies. In short, AIDS is clearly a serious threat to the entire population.

All is not grim on the subject of AIDS. Last year, the Congress and the administration responded to give the National Institutes of Health every nickel it requested to battle this disease. There are promising reports from this battlefront, precisely because we were able last year to marshal a portion of the Nation's resources against this disease. But there is great danger ahead; 80 percent of the people with AIDS die within 2 years. This incurable disease is spreading quickly. Some 8,000 Americans were found to have AIDS in 1985; 15,000 more are expected to get a similar diagnosis in 1986 and the figure is expected to double again in 1987. It is vital that the Nation maintain the flexibility to deal not only with this crisis, but any that presents itself.

I say to my good friend from Maryland, there is a great deal wrong in the sense of the deficits of this Nation. There is a great deal wrong with the inability of individual Congressmen and Senators to stand up and be counted, and there is a great deal wrong with the American people for failure to kick out those who imbalance the budget or reward those who do balance the budget. But there is not one thing wrong with the Constitution of the United States. It sits alone in its magnificence, no matter how banal our actions on the floor or how uncaring the nonparticipation of the American voters.

Mr. MATHIAS. Once again, we can remember the words of Gladstone, who said:

I have always regarded that Constitution as the most remarkable work known to me in modern times to have been produced by the human intellect, at a single stroke (so to speak), in its application to political affairs.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. WEICKER. I thank my distinguished colleague from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Let us vote.

Mr. CHILES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

AMENDMENT NO. 1661

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment on behalf of myself and Senator DOMENICI and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida [Mr. CHILES], for himself and Mr. DOMENICI, proposes an amendment numbered 1661.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the amendment, insert the following new sections:

"SEC. . The Congress shall enforce and implement this article by appropriate legislation.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, as a member of the Senate Budget Committee, I fully appreciate the value of balancing the budget. And I am glad the Senate has another chance to write a balanced budget requirement into the Constitution.

So, it is not what is in this constitutional amendment that bothers me. It is what is missing that I worry about.

In August of 1982, the Senate approved a constitutional amendment to balance the budget. We approved it 69 to 31. I voted for it. And I played a role in helping shape that amendment by adding something to it. In section 5 of the amendment, we included the provision:

The Congress shall enforce and implement this article by appropriate legislation.

I thought then, and I believe today, that was a key feature of the amendment. It was a sort of guarantee on our will power.

The question is what moved Congress to underline the fact that the amendment would be enforced with appropriate legislation?

It might have something to do with skepticism about good intentions. Years ago, one of the most popular songs in the Nation was "Oh, Promise Me." Well, over the years we have come to understand in this country that a constitutional amendment may be the highest legal form of promise. But if that is all it is, it is still just a promise.

I am afraid the promise before us now—Senate Joint Resolution 225—is sort of a streamlined pledge to balance the budget without making any provision for the kind of legislative punch to make sure we keep that promise.

We are sort of hauling out the heavy artillery here, but we have not been putting in the ammunition. Even among the first 10 amendments to the Constitution—the bill of rights—article III said, "no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law."

Now, when we are facing one of the most profound constitutional issues in modern America—balancing the budget—it seems to me we should do more than just promise to get it done. We ought to provide for the legislative means to make sure that will happen.

I do not think the country can put up with an empty promise no matter how noble it sounds. I think they deserve the assurance we will do what we say.

Of course, some will point to last year's enactment of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law as evidence that Congress can and will act to provide the legislative means to balance the budget. Why make provision for legislative enforcement in this constitutional amendment?

The answer to that should be clear. To keep the heat and the pressure on. I do not think we can automatically assume that approving a constitutional amendment and hitching it to a law we passed last year is a guarantee that we have done the full job. What we have now might need to be changed. What we have now might not be good enough.

When we last debated the constitutional amendment I introduced a rewrite of the Budget Act which would implement the amendment. Some of the budgetary control procedures and points of order from that bill were incorporated in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. But another key provision was missing. It required the Budget Committee to report a reconciliation bill to meet the balanced budget agreement each year. Not an automatic across-the-board sequester by executive fiat, but a piece of legislation where we examined priorities and met the goals.

What we have before us now, however, is a constitutional amendment without the specified mandate to enact the laws necessary to convert it from a promise into a living part of the national charter.

The way the amendment stands right now, it could produce some unintended consequences.

It says "outlays * * * shall not exceed receipts to the United States" in a given year. I have no quarrel with that. But there are a number of ways to reach that goal, and one of them is the impoundment of funds by the President.

We fought that battle once before during the early 1970's. The President did not use his impoundment authority just to save money as many of his predecessors had done. He used it to alter—and in some cases—reverse congressional policy. It was no longer a question of withholding funds because they could not be spent effectively. It was no longer a case of viewing appropriated funds as a ceiling. Impoundment became a means of overturning the judgment of the public expressed through the Congress.

Our response to that crisis was legislation, the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Act of 1974. We were confronted with a dilemma, and no amount of good intentions and no number of promises were enough to get things in order. We had to act. We had to pass legislation to enforce our will.

There can be no question that a constitutional amendment is a shell, no matter how highly polished. Something must follow. Visions don't become facts unless you act on them. There has got to be some mechanism between the hope expressed in a constitutional amendment and the aim it is intended to achieve. And the mechanism must be legislation. We know that. And we should make provision for it in the amendment itself.

Certainly, heavy-handed impoundments are a possibility we must be prepared to guard against. But we also have to give ourselves the means to deal with problems spawned by an activist judicial branch.

In the effort to balance the budget, we could be confronted with class action suits on particular budget cuts. An activist court could end up telling the President and Congress where to spend and where to avoid spending; where to cut and where to avoid cutting. Sort of court-ordered busing between budget accounts.

Certainly Congress would act to deal with circumstances like that. But we can make it clear beyond question Congress has that power by saying so in this amendment.

Now, I know the Senate Judiciary Committee report on Senate Joint Resolution 13 argues that the authority to enact legislation to carry out the amendment is somehow implicit in the Constitution itself. But the language I am proposing today makes clear what is now merely implicit.

The Constitution is not a self-executing document. It is subject to interpretation. We have spent some of the most momentous parts of our history haggling over what the Constitution says. And, as this amendment now stands, I am afraid it does not say enough.

The report on Senate Joint Resolution 13, the predecessor of the amendment now before the Senate, says the amendment does not vest the President with any new impoundment authority. It says further that the amendment does not alter the separation of powers. And I agree with that as far as it goes. But the trouble is it raises issues outside the scope of my point today. The point is this:

The mere declaration that we want to balance the budget does not guarantee we will adopt the means to do it. It will not send the message that certain existing authorities might have to be changed or others created. So the issue is not whether the amendment creates some now-hidden power that will knock the Constitution out of kilter. The issue is whether Congress will enact the measures necessary to meet the goals set by the amendment itself.

Congress—and the President—have a long history of circumventing responsibility. I do not like it. No one does. But confronted by hard choices, we have often found ways to get around them. The modification I offer today aims to make clear to the public that the responsibility is squarely on our shoulders.

It will deny Congress the fallback position of relying on the implicit or the assumed. It basically says we approved the amendment, and now we are determined to enforce it. If we do not, we could all be rightly questioned about why we chose to sidestep a specific constitutional responsibility.

Mr. President, no matter what language we put in this constitutional amendment, no matter how forceful we make it sound, the only thing that will make it work is us. We have to develop the means to implement and enforce it. The amendment says, "I do." But we are the ones who will have to make the marriage work.

What I ask today is for the Senate to make it clear that Congress has the resolve to match its promise. Let us put language in this amendment and make part of the Constitution the unmistakable point that we will do what is necessary to uphold the constitutional mandate to balance the budget.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, to save time, I just want to say that we are willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I intend to be very brief. We are willing to accept this amendment, as the distinguished Senator from South Carolina has indicated. We do not believe it is essential to this constitutional amendment, because we think that implicit within the amendment is the requisite to have implementing legislation.

The distinguished Senator from Florida is very concerned about this, being the ranking minority member of the Budget Committee. We feel it is an appropriate amendment. It will not change the intent of the constitutional amendment, and we will accept this amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I will be brief, also.

I just want to say that during the consideration of the balanced budget constitutional amendment of 1982, I sponsored, along with Senator CHILES, a package of amendments which the Senate adopted by a vote of 97 to 0. One of those amendments was the section saying, "Congress shall enforce and implement this article by appropriate legislation." As I understand it, the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Florida does just that.

I think we should make it eminently clear that we do intend to implement by legislation this constitutional amendment. I urge its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1661) was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agree to.

Mr. THURMOND. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1662

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, on behalf of myself and the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. CHILES], and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI], for himself and Mr. CHILES, proposes an amendment numbered 1662:

In section 1 of the pending amendment, strike "Outlays of the United States for any fiscal year shall not exceed receipts" and insert in lieu thereof:

"Total outlays of the United States for any fiscal year shall not exceed total receipts."

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, last fall the Congress enacted balanced budget legislation which set our Nation on a glide path toward a balanced Federal budget. The Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 put us on the road to preserving our short-term economic health.

Senate Joint Resolution 225, the balanced budget constitutional amendment, addresses our Nation's long-term economic health. While Gramm-Rudman-Hollings was enacted to bring us to a balanced budget in 1991, the balanced budget constitutional amendment is designed to keep us there. I commend the Judiciary Committee and the majority leader for bringing this measure before the Senate.

Make no mistake: this amendment is not a panacea. It will not, by itself, produce balanced budgets. The hard decisions on how to achieve budgetary balance will still have to be made by future Presidents and Congresses. No process, no procedure, not even a constitutional amendment, can do that for us.

I do believe, however, that a balanced budget constitutional amendment can generate needed pressure on future Congresses and Presidents to make those tough decisions. If the highest law of the land requires future policymakers to produce balanced budgets, the tough choices which ought to be made will be made.

I therefore support the idea of a balanced budget constitutional amendment. However, before I can support the joint resolution before us, we need to strengthen it. We must do all we can to ensure that this amendment to our Constitution will be every bit as effective as the rest of the Constitution. I am therefore offering a perfecting amendment which, I believe, will improve the effectiveness of the balanced budget amendment.

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT

In 1982, the version of the balanced budget amendment, passed by the Senate 69 to 31, included language which made explicit the intent of Congress that all outlays and all receipts are to be included in calculation of the deficit. That language provided that "total receipts shall include all receipts of the United States except those derived from borrowing and total outlays shall include all outlays of the United States except those for repayment of debt principal."

The Judiciary Committee report on Senate Joint Resolution 225 states that such language is "believed to be unnecessary in the body of the proposed amendment, although it continues to reflect the intent of the committee."

Mr. President, I share the Judiciary Committee's view that all outlays and all receipts ought to be on-budget for purposes of calculating the deficit. However, I believe our intent on this matter should be made explicit. I am therefore offering an amendment which would make clear that all outlays and all receipts are to be included when we calculate our adherence to the balanced budget requirement.

Very simply, my amendment inserts the word "total" before "outlays" and "receipts" in section 1 of the pending substitute. Section 1, as so amended, would read:

> Total outlays of the United States for any fiscal year shall not exceed total receipts to the United States for that year, unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress shall provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts.

My amendment accomplishes the same purpose as the provision passed by the Senate in 1982, but in a simpler way. It will ensure that the Congress is faithful to the spirit, as well as the letter, of the balanced budget amendment. And it will ensure that our budget process continues to accurately reflect the impact of our Federal budget on the American economy.

Budgetary gimmickry, such as excluding certain outlays from budgetary calculations or excluding capital expenditures, must not be allowed as a means of avoiding constitutional requirements. I therefore urge the Senate to adopt this clarifying amendment.

CONCLUSION

With this amendment I believe we will have a good amendment worthy of adding to our Constitution. We will be affirming as a Nation that our old habits of burdening our children with the debts of their parents are going to end. And we will be committing our Nation to the fundamental principle of fiscal responsibility.

Mr. President, earlier I said to the Senate that in 1982 the Senate passed the balanced budget constitutional amendment with similar language. My amendment is simpler in form than it was before. It merely has two words, "total," in two different places.

There is no way we can asure what Congress will do in the future with reference to receipts and outlays. This makes it clear that we are talking about all of them. The word "total" precedes and make operative, in a broader sense, the word "receipts" and the word "outlays."

I thank the distinguished Senator from Florida for cosponsoring the amendment. I hope it will be accepted.

Mr. CHILES. I join my distinguished colleague.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we have considered this amendment. We think it is a good amendment and are willing to accept it.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, on this side, we also have looked at it. We think it is an excellent amendment and accept it.

WHAT IS MEANT BY THE TERM "OUTLAYS?" COULD THE AMENDMENT BE CIRCUMVENTED BY "OFF BUDGET" SPENDING?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, we are prepared to accept the amendment. We think it makes the amendment more clear.

The key word here is "outlays," because anything the Federal Government spends, except to pay off the debt, is embraced within the term "outlays" in the amendment. Outlays includes off-budget spending.

You would not be able to purchase oil reserves with debt under the amendment except straight up as part of the overall budget outlay problem. And there is no way that that could occur without a vote on it. In this case, it would have to be either a three-fifths vote, if we wanted to deficit spend in order to purchase that oil, or we would have to have a constitutional majority in order to raise taxes to pay for it, or we would have to reduce spending elsewhere to do it. One way or the other, we would have to stand up, vote, and be counted. A few years ago, we did move to off-budget spending in that category and there was not the concomitant standing up and voting, such as we would have under the amendment.

I might also add that "outlays" is intended to include, according to page 42 of our committee report:

> All disbursements from the Treasury of the United States, either directly or indirectly through Federal or quasi-Federal agencies created under the authority of acts of Congress, and either "on budget" or "off budget." With certain notable exceptions, outlays are those withdrawals subject to article I, section 9, which provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1662) was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, it is no secret on the floor that we are attempting to accelerate the process because one of the Members will have to leave at 5 o'clock. I urge upon my colleague from Utah that if he thinks he has an amendment, he call it up. I do not believe there is any objection to it.

Mr. HATCH. We are trying to check on it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Time is rapidly running out on us. If there is not a vote by 5 o'clock, we will have to kick this matter over for a week, and I do not think any of us want to do that. We are prepared to vote on this bill.

Mr. HATCH. We will try to move as expeditiously as we can. We would like to meet that deadline for you. We will do the best we can.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask my colleagues: Is there some reason for delay? I point out that on Thursday and Friday, I wanted to vote on this matter. We are trying to vote now. I agree that both the distinguished Senator from South Carolina and the manager for the minority have worked hard on this matter, and they deserve a vote. If it is not going to occur shortly, it will not occur for quite a period of time.

Mr. HATCH. In answer to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, we hope to get this vote this afternoon. We have a couple of last minute things.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, yesterday we waited all day for people to offer amendments and they did not do it, and we have been rushing all we can.

Mr. HATCH. We waited 3 days before we had any amendments. Now, suddenly, everybody has to move quickly. We are trying to accommodate them, but we will not do it on a constitutional amendment unless it is done right.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the managers of the bill have controlled the floor. We are perfectly willing to have them vote.

There is an amendment that I understand the Senator from Utah has on behalf of the Senator from Colorado. We do not have any particular problem with it. We do not think it is a particularly bad amendment.

We think we should move this process along and not put it over for another week.

I cannot urge those who have amendments strongly enough to come to the floor to offer their amendments.

We do not want to delay this matter for another week, but if certain Senators have to leave and there will not be a full complement of the Members of the body, then it will be delayed.

I know the majority leader has attempted to accelerate the process. We want to accelerate it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I do indeed.

Mr. HATCH. We understand that there are two amendments remaining. We know of one that is going to be offered by Senator McCLURE and Senator MATTINGLY.

We would invite them to come to the floor immediately and let us have it offered. There will have to be a rollcall vote on their amendment.

The second one will be one offered by me on behalf of Senators THURMOND, HATCH, DECONCINI, SIMON, ARMSTRONG, BOREN, and GRAMM. We are not prepared to offer that at this time, so we need to go on the McClure-Mattingly amendment.

We anticipate that the amendment I will offer will not take an exorbitant period of time.

So if Senators McCLURE and MATTINGLY will come to the floor and offer an amendment, we will finish it up.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator be good enough to explain why we have to wait for Senators McCLURE and MATTINGLY to come to the floor?

Mr. HATCH. As the Senator knows, it is a constitutional amendment. They have spoken to us. We feel we have to offer that. I think the distinguished Senator from Ohio does also. I believe they will come to the floor. We have sent notice to them.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, let the RECORD show that if there is a delay in the matter and it has to be put over, the burden will lie on those who are the proponents, not on the opponents. We are prepared to act.

Mr. HATCH. Wait a minute. Let us not get to that.

We waited 3 days for the first amendment to be offered. All of a sudden, those who are opposing this want to just push this thing right along. We do, too. We would like to have a vote and are prepared to vote.

We are not going to turn around and mistreat any Senator who has indicated a desire to bring an amendment to the floor. If it goes over a week, that is fine with me.

But my point is I would just as soon get it over with today and have a vote up-or-down and let the chips fall where they may.

We have done everything we know how to do on this amendment, and I think the distinguished Senator from Ohio has done the same, as well as the distinguished Senator from Washington.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 13, which laid the groundwork, in this Congress, for today's compromise amendment, which I have also cosponsored, I am going to be very pleased to cast my vote for a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution.

Balancing the Federal Government's budget by reducing or limiting spending has been one of my top legislative priorities in the 11 years that I have served in this and the other body. There is no question that Federal spending must be restrained if we are to bring interest rates under control and continue the progress we have made in lowering the rate of inflation, thereby creating more economic stability.

It took two centuries for this country to pile up its first trillion dollars of debt. It took only 5 years for the second trillion. At this rate, it will take only 3 years for the third trillion dollars of national debt.

We are very clearly on a crisis course. Since 1979, the annual increase in the debt is rising faster than the size of the deficit. We create debt this year to pay off last year's debt. This, of course, is the textbook illustration of a country headed for bankruptcy.

Meanwhile, the runaway debt is compounding itself exponentially, relative to our ability to pay for it. This year's deficit adds to the pressure. The rapid expansion and compounding of debt locks us into a permanent debt spiral which is feeding on itself. This is not a situation where we can merely continue to borrow, or, because of the mind-boggling size, repudiate it. I can assure you, Mr. President, we will pay for it.

As a farmer and legislator, I believe that, without question, American farmers and agribusinesses have a greater stake in the monetary, fiscal, and trade policies that are being debated in Washington than almost any other group in America. In my own State of Iowa, thousands of small farmers and businesses are disappearing because of the immediate detrimental impact deficit spending has had on interest rates and overseas markets. As a working farmer, I see real interest rates that are four to five times higher than what they should be. Interest expense as a percentage of all farm production expenses has more than doubled—from 7 percent in 1973 to 16 percent in 1985.

These higher interest costs, which are a direct result of deficit spending, have, in turn, caused the unacceptable drop in net farm income. The drastic economic situation on the farm is a formidable foreshadowing of the desperate economic condition the entire Nation will be in if the President and Congress do not learn to live within our budgetary means.

Mr. President, over the years that I have been involved in the struggle for economic stability, I have become convinced that a constitutional amendment—this constitutional amendment, for sure, or even a better one that was voted on and passed in 1982—mandating a balanced budget in either instance is absolutely necessary.

In 1978, I happened to have been an author of an amendment, just a change in the law, that was added to the International Monetary Fund bill that year that happened to be the first Federal statutory requirement of a balanced budget, which was to begin in 1981. Unfortunately, both the executive and the legislative branches have failed to abide by this restriction.

In 1982, the Senate passed a proposed constitutional amendment to balance the budget. I cosponsored that amendment, as well as the one before us. I participated in the debate that year. The debate took place over several days, and I voted for the amendment. Unfortunately, that proposal was defeated in the House of Representatives.

Nevertheless, last year, Congress enacted another statutory attempt to contain Federal spending in the so-called Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill, which appeared to have a better chance for success because of built-in enforcement mechanisms. However, this statutory remedy's long-term effectiveness is uncertain due to a, thus far, successful constitutional challenge. However, even if successful, the statute only applies to budgets through 1991.

Consequently, because the Congress and the President cannot seem to effectively adhere to a policy of fiscal restraint, I am convinced that a constitutional solution is essential. A balanced budget provision should have been made a part of the Constitution years ago, which, I believe, would have gone a long way in securing financial stability for the entire international economy.

Therefore, I hope my colleagues will join me in voting for this present balanced budget amendment to the Constitution, which is a vote for fiscal responsibility, and a stable future for our Nation.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1663

(Purpose: To provide that expenditures may not exceed receipts except under certain circumstances)

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] proposes an amendment numbered 1663 to Amendment No. 1652.

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following: "That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission to the States for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The Congress shall ensure that expenditures of public money by the federal government do not exceed its receipts, except in time of war or military conflict; or when, by an affirmative vote of three-fifths of the whole number of each House, the Congress provides for a specific excess of expenditures over receipts.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"SEC. 3. This Article shall take effect in 1991 or for the second fiscal year beginning after its ratification, whichever is later."

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I shall not speak long. I understand there are some Members who have appointments and engagements and must leave the floor shortly. I, therefore, will speak briefly.

Mr. President, nearly 2 centuries ago the values, the ideals, and the freedoms of this great Republic were forever enshrined in the most magnificent document of its kind yet designed by the human mind—the Constitution of the United States. Those principles, passed on to us by the sages of years long past, have charted a course for generations of Americans—generations who have lived, who have died, and generations yet unborn.

The foresight, the wisdom, and the vision of those great leaders are qualities ever to be cherished and always to be held dear. The enduring nature of this document, our national charter, breathes through our separate lives, and pulsates through the collective soul of our great country without repose. It guides us in our daily tasks. It restrains us in our professional endeavors. And it is so much a part of the very essence of our American life that we sometimes take for granted its very existence.

As this historic debate draws to a close, we must be mindful that it is that historic document which is the subject of our discussions in this Chamber today. Only 16 times since the adoption of the Bill of Rights have we dared to alter this document. Most of those changes involved fundamental questions of human freedoms and human rights in the processes of our Government. The single occasion when we sought to address something less basic to our national care turned out to be a mistake.

It would serve us well to recall Hamilton's words today. And I quote from the Federalist Papers No. 34:

Constitutions of civil government are not to be framed upon a calculation of existing exigencies, but upon a combination of these with the probable exigencies of ages, according to the natural and tried course of human affairs. Nothing, therefore, can be more fallacious than to infer the extent of any power proper to be lodged in the national government from an estimate of its immediate necessities. There ought to be a capacity to provide for future contingencies as they may happen; and as these are illimitable in their nature, so it is impossible safely to limit that capacity.

Mr. President, keeping the vision of Hamilton before us, let us examine what it is that we are seeking to accomplish here today. Let us be mindful, as was Hamilton, that if the Constitution of the United States is to be inscribed with new words, new phrases, and new directions, then we shall be charting a new course, not just for this time and place alone, but also for centuries yet to come.

We must ask ourselves, as did Hamilton, whether we are truly framing language "not upon a calculation of existing exigencies, but upon a combination of these with the probable exigencies of ages."

Mr. President, we ask, What is our task here today? The answer seems clear. We hear the people's call. We are called upon to act. We must respond, not only for the people of today, but also for the children of tomorrow.

Our task is to forge new language into the Constitution of the United States, language that will live and endure for ages to come.

We have engaged our wisdom, our energies, and our capacities in a commendable way. I salute my colleagues for their efforts. I would not doubt for a moment their sincerity or the justice of their cause. I commend my colleagues on both sides of the aisle. I congratulate the proponents and the opponents.

Our goal is to fashion consensus from all the truths which have been uttered during the course of this debate. And if we fail, it will surely not be for the want of our having tried, so try we must. I believe that we can fashion effective and meaningful constitutional language to accomplish the task at hand. But I do not believe that Senate Joint Resolution 225 presently offers such language.

My effort today comes only from the judgment that we can do better for the generations yet unborn. I believe that we can artfully craft new phrases, and new clauses which will better befit our responsibilities as Members of the body.

In a literal sense we have not been elected just by our contemporaries but we must also serve the people who are still to come in the future. It is my judgment that the ends sought by the distinguished sponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 225 can best be achieved by the subsitute which I have offered. Our goals are the same—to achieve, by force of constitutional mandate, a balanced budget.

Let no one doubt for a single moment that if a constitutional amendment is adopted by the two Houses of this Congress it will be a major step in the history of our country.

I agree with the sponsors of the pending resolution that the problem of continuing tremendous deficits has reached such magnitude that a new form of budgetary discipline is now required. That is the conclusion reached by the sponsors, and that is the goal of my proposed substitute.

Mr. President, in looking at the Constitution note that each provision is a model of brevity, of directness, and of simplicity. Its words and phrases were chosen with the greatest of care so to provide for that essential flexibility which is the obvious and necessary ingredient in crafting language that will serve for generations to come.

The Constitution, Mr. President, should not contain all of the precise details concerning how we are to conduct our affairs. Changing times and circumstances may occasion new approaches and new duties. The language that I have provided in my amendment allows the flexibility necessary to adapt to those changing needs in the future.

My substitute states a principle for the governance of our Republic. It states a requirement for the management of the people's money. And there are exceptions that provide for obvious unforeseen circumstances—for example, a situation in which American fighting men are involved in an undeclared war.

My amendment also provides the flexibility needed for a situation in which American military forces have been thrust into circumstances in which there is not a military conflict,

Thomas Jefferson warned us not to hold the Constitution with such sanctimonious reverence that it be viewed like the Ark of the Covenant—too sacred to be touched. "Some men," he said, "ascribe to the men of the preceding age of wisdom more than human" and suppose that what they did was beyond amendment. "Let us not," Jefferson admonished, "weakly believe that one generation is not as capable as another of taking care of itself and of ordering its own affairs. Each generation is as independent of the one preceeding as that was of all which has gone before. It has then, like them, a right to choose for itself the form of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness. Consequently, to accommodate to the circumstances in which it finds itself, that received from its predecessors; and it is for the peace and good of mankind, that a solemn opportunity of doing this is provided by the Constitution; so that it may be handed on, with periodic repairs, from generation to generation, to the end of time, if anything human can so long endure."

Mr. President, it is incumbent upon us to follow the charge of Jefferson, restrained by the warnings of Hamilton about the "probable exigencies of the ages." I have attempted to achieve that end. Fortunately, our efforts in this Chamber will not be the end of the process, but only the beginning. Ultimately the people of this country will decide, if the other body, following what may be an adoption of the amendment by this body, decides in its wisdom to likewise adopt the constitutional amendment. The people of this country will then decide whether this language should become a part of our Constitution.

As Talleyrand said—and I have quoted Talleyrand in other circumstances even today—"There is more wisdom in public opinion than is to be found in Napoleon, Voltaire, or all of the ministers of state, present and to come." The people through their State legislatures, or in convention, will tell us whether they will accept what we have done. That is the way it should be. That is the way it must be. And the American people will have made their choice.

Mr. President, as I indicated earlier, I do not wish to impose further upon the time of the Senate, but only because of my recognition that there are others of our colleagues on both sides of the aisle who must depart this place, and yet who wish to vote on this proposal before their departure.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have the Senator's revised version, and I think it adds a lot of thought and a lot of language, but basically still provides for an affirmative vote of three-fifths of the whole number when we provide for a specific excess of expenditures over receipts. And the Senator's amendment talks in terms of the "expenditure of public money". By the acceptance of a good number of amendments, we do not know where we are in the Hatch-Thurmond-Simon amendment. I am concerned that by taking the word "total," they have eliminated every definition that was in the balanced-budget report. Where they made some distinctions between what the outlays were and receipts, all receipts and all outlays under the word "total" that they have accepted are now included. So I think where we were relying on the report language, we cannot.

I also notice that the Senator's amendment says in time of war but it does not say declared war. And the Senator's amendment says military conflict. I think the Senator's amendment has some merit, as I consider it. I think we are in a state of great confusion here with no longer any definitions to follow that were in the report language. The Senator's proposal is very brief. It certainly provides for an exception in time of war. It does not have to be declared war. It provides for military conflict.

At this stage in looking at this, I see this is different from what I had previously seen that the Senator had proposed, but as the debate has gone on the Senator has refined his amendment.

It appears that you now have a very workable amendment. I congratulate the Senator.

Would the Senator care to elaborate on what expenditures of public money might mean as opposed to total outlays?

Mr. BYRD. That is a phrase we find used in the Constitution. This is exactly what I was referring to earlier; namely, that I had tried to adopt some of the phrases and words in the original Constitution because not only does such approach allow for greater flexibility in the application of the amendment, but it also allows for some better understanding of just what is meant by virtue of the fact that by using phrases that are already in the Constitution we find in many instances the Court has already deliberated, spoken on, written of, and reached decisions making interpretations to which we may repair.

I also must say that I discussed this amendment with the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama earlier, and some of the changes that I have made in the verbiage of the amendment were the result of my having talked with the distinguished Senator [Mr. HEFLIN], who was formerly the chief judge of the Alabama Supreme Court.

He is quite right also in making reference to the verbiage "except in time of war or military conflict."

The fact that we do not in this amendment speak of a declared war is because, as the distinguished Senator from Alabama has pointed out before on many occasions, this country has engaged in undeclared wars on a number of occasions. I believe I am correct in saying that this country has not fought a declared war since World War II; yet, this country was deeply embroiled in, and suffered greatly in blood and treasure from participation in the Vietnam war and the Korean war.

So it is for that reason that this language has been adopted.

"Section 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation" is language found in other amendments to the Constitution; for example, in the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments, this language appears.

So Congress can spell out at a date subsequent to the adoption of the language here today just what actions should be taken to enforce the article and Congress also can seek to better define and interpret the language thereof.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Alabama for his counsel and advice and for his expression of support.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the measure the Senate is preparing to vote upon is primarily sponsored by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, Mr. ROBERT BYRD. It is an interesting footnote in history that the roots of this amendment, I think Mr. BYRD of West Virginia would acknowledge, were in legislation put before this distinguished body by Harry F. Byrd, Sr., and Harry F. Byrd, Jr., when each, through the years, propounded various pieces of legislation to eliminate the deficit and balance the budget.

I specifically remember Harry F. Byrd, Jr., each year proposing an amendment which said that the expenditures of the Federal Government could not exceed its revenues. In 1977 it became the law of the land—a statutory requirement to balance the budget. However, several years later Congress unwisely chose to repeal that mandate. It is for that reason that I am pleased to join my colleagues in supporting this measure.

Mr. HATCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in his usual way, the distinguished minority leader has tried here to have a consensus and bring people together. He has made a great effort to do so, as you read this amendment, and made a great effort to accommodate our distinguished friend from Alabama as well.

It says:

SECTION 1. The Congress shall ensure that expenditures of public money by the federal government do not exceed its receipts, except in time of war or military conflict; or when, by an affirmative vote of three-fifths of the whole number of each House, the Congress provides for a specific excess of expenditures over receipts.

The amendment itself leaves a lot of ambiguities and loopholes, as we see it. "Expenditures of public money" is ambiguous. It does away with the constitutional amendment to balance the budget "except in time of war," whatever that means, "or military conflict," whatever that means.

So there are some really serious exceptions in here that I think would basically make the constitutional amendment not only less effective but probably not effective.

I would suggest that exceptions in this amendment engulf the rule. The exceptions are sufficiently broad to permit this language from achieving its stated objective of fiscal responsibility and accountability. Due to the breadth of this proposed amendment, it would not establish linkage between taxing and spending decisions but merely perpetuate the current regime. I think that is true.

Second, the language is ambiguous. "In time of war," does that mean declared war or simply time of military conflict? The latter applies to Grenada, Vietnam, Korea. Does this mean war in which the United States is involved or a conflict in which the United States may have an interest? Does it involve the CIA, the State Department, DOD?

The latter may apply to Nicaragua or Afghanistan because they are conflicts in which the United States has an interest. A broad and yet fair reading of the phrase could excuse compliance with the balanced budget requirement in nearly every day of every year, which is pretty much the problem we have had with these amendments from the word go.

The "expenditures of public money" though found in article I, section 9, has always been an ambiguous term which may have unintended limitations. In its article I context these words only seem to apply to the executive branch's action in disbursing funds from the General Treasury. This raises questions about whether the Federal Government transactions outside the Treasury would be exempt from the proposed language: Borrowing by FHA or other Government agencies, taxing or paying out of special trust funds, for instance, Social Security, and the like.

The word "ensure." This apparently means make sure or guarantee. Congress without an executive branch check would apparently determine what is necessary to meet this new constitutional standard. Does this mean only that the Congress must make its best effort and if the President frustrates that effort that Congress is excused? Could Congress differ on the degree of effort necessary to satisfy the "ensure" standard?

Some may argue that as long as Congress did its best to ensure, it is excused if circumstances "beyond its control" were determined by Congress to have frustrated its efforts. Congress would make the determination by majority vote concerning what degree of guarantee satisfies the standard. That, of course, puts us right back to current law.

This amendment also is addressed solely to the executive branch.

By exclusively mentioning Congress, does this proposal intend to exclude the executive branch from any responsibility to comply, which we do take care of in the present amendment before this body? That is, the constitutional amendment of Senator THURMOND and I.

The President's veto power makes him a participant in the appropriations and spending process. Moreover, the Commander in Chief authority makes the President able to initiate military conflict, apparently exceptions to the terms of the proposed amendment. Would the President be obligated to use his constitutional powers to reach the objectives of the proposed amendment?

These are not questions that can be answered today except I think many of them would have to be answered adversely to this amendment, if they are answered at all. I think they would be certainly in the future answered that way.

There is superfluous language here. "The Congress shall have the power to enforce" has only been included in those constitutional amendments limiting State action. In those cases, it was necessary to establish that Congress possessed the power previously held exclusively by the States. This language empowered Congress to preempt conflicting State laws.

In this proposed amendment, on the other hand, it only limits the Federal Government. Congress already has under article I, sections 8 and 9, all the authority to enforce this proposal by legislation. Who else would have the power? Is this language adding anything? What is it adding, if it does?

As you can see, there are many, many questions on this amendment, as there are on all constitutional amendments.

That is why we spent so many years and so many hours and so many hearings and so many witnesses listening to language with regard to the constitutional amendment that Senator THURMOND has offered.

I do not want to take any more time, because we are trying to conclude this discussion, we are trying to come to a final vote on this amendment. I would recommend that our colleagues not accept this amendment at this time, filed at the last minute of the last hour of the last day of this constitutional amendment debate, because there are too many ambiguities and too many unanswered questions. Even the questions that can be answered I think are adverse to having a balanced budget. So I recommend that we consider not voting for this amendment.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending.

Is there further debate on the pending amendment? If there be no further discussion, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, let me first say to my distinguished leader that this is much better than the original amendment that I first saw. I think there are still substantial problems.

When we say "except in time of war," are we talking about declared war? "Military conflict." What is that? Is what is happening in Nicaragua today military conflict?

These are just a few of what I believe are several substantial questions. I think, with all due respect to my leader, who is one of the finest persons ever to have graced this body, I shall not support his amendment. At the appropriate time, I shall make a motion to lay it on the table.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope the distinguished Senator will not make a motion to table this amendment. That would be within his rights, of course, but the amendment is sincere enough and serious enough to deserve an up or down vote. I hope the Senate will be permitted to vote it up or down.

I do not intend to further take the time of the Senate, so a motion to table would not be necessary in order to shut off debate.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I shall yield to the admonitions of my leader, as I ordinarily do, and not press the motion to table.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished friend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further discussion?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further discussion? If there be no further discussion, the question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON: I announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. LAXALT] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DANFORTH). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

NOT VOTING—1

Laxalt

So the amendment (No. 1663) was rejected.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, a number of questions have been asked during the course of this debate as to whether implementing legislation would be required subsequent to the passage of this amendment. I would like to review some of these questions in order to see if the floor manager agrees that subsequent implementing legislation would be required.

How would the monitoring of the flow of receipts and outlays be done to determine whether the budget for any fiscal year is on the track of being balanced? Would this require implementing legislation?

Mr. SIMON. There would have to be monitoring, and future legislation would have to take care of the implementation of that monitoring.

Mr. LEVIN. What exactly is the definition of receipts and outlays? Specifically, would the receipts and outlays of Bonneville Power Administration be receipts and outlays of the United States pursuant to this constitutional amendment? Would the answer to these questions require implementing legislation?

Mr. SIMON. Implementing legislation will be needed on some of these peripheral questions, but the intent is clear.

Mr. LEVIN. Who would have standing to sue in court to enforce the amendment? Would the answer to this question require implementing legislation?

Mr. SIMON. There is a difference of opinion on this, and future legislation will have to take care of this.

Mr. LEVIN. I ask the floor managers whether a similar response would apply to the following questions.

In an instance in which the President's Office of Management and Budget and the Congressional Budget Office disagree with each other on what a level of outlays is, how will the dispute be resolved so that it can be determined whether or not outlays exceed receipts?

Mr. SIMON. Future legislation will have to take care of this.

Mr. LEVIN. Who will determine the level of receipts and whether a revenue bill is "a bill to increase revenues"? For example, the Finance Committee is now laboring under the burden of keeping tax reform legislation "revenue neutral." It is my understanding from staff discussions that a revenue neutral bill would not be "a bill to increase revenues" under the terms of this constitutional amendment. If it is revenue neutral, then under this amendment it could be passed by a majority of those present and voting. If it was not revenue neutral, but rather a bill that would be a net tax increase, then it would require 51 votes in the Senate. My question is, What happens if the revenue estimaters in the Treasury Department say the bill is revenue neutral, and the Joint Committee on Taxation say the bill will result in a net increase in revenues? Whose estimate will prevail? How will the dispute be resolved?

Mr. SIMON. That will also have to be determined through future legislation.

Mr. LEVIN. At what point will it be determined that outlays will in fact exceed revenues and that action such as a tax increase, spending cuts, or tapping into a rainy day fund will be required? August 1, September 15? Who will make the determination?

Mr. SIMON. There again will have to be regular monitoring, and future legislation will work out the details.

Mr. LEVIN. Finally, one reason why the proponents of this legislation indicate that it will be abided by is that Members of Congress are required by their oath to uphold the Constitution. My question is this: Would it be possible for every Member of Congress to vote for a different balanced budget, but to have none of those budgets passed? Would not, then, each Member of Congress have abided by his or her oath of office, but there still would not be a balanced budget?

Mr. SIMON. That theory would not happen in practice. Clearly, Members of Congress would not be complying with either the spirit or letter of the Constitution if collectively they did not balance the budget.

AMENDMENT NO. 1664

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself and Senator MATTINGLY and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. McCLURE], for himself and Mr. MATTINGLY, proposed an amendment numbered 1664.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, strike out lines 16 through 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"'SECTION 3. Notwithstanding section 1 of this article, total outlays for a fiscal year shall not exceed an amount equal to the greater of—

"'(1) the difference between—

"'(A) an amount which bears the same ratio to the national income of the United States at the close of such fiscal year as total outlays for the preceding fiscal year bear to the national income of the United States at the close of such preceding fiscal year, and

"'(B) an amount which is equal to 1 percent of the national income for such fiscal year; or

"'(2) 20 percent of the national income for such fiscal year.

"'SECTION 4. The Congress may waive the provisions of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war in in effect.

"'SECTION 5. This article shall take effect for the fiscal year 1991 or for the second fiscal year beginning after its ratification, whichever is later.'.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will withhold. The Senate is not in order.

The Senate is still not in order.

The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I thank the Chair for establishing order.

I will be very brief. I know that the die is cast, I believe, with respect to this pending amendment. I think the votes on various amendments which have been offered would indicate that the committee has not only drawn a very tight line but also is able to maintain that tight line here without respect to the merits or the demerits of any specific proposal. So perhaps what I am doing is an exercise in futility.

But, Mr. President, I think it is important, if we are going to pass an amendment to the Constitution, that it embody the principles which we think are important, not just to pass an amendment for the sake of an amendment, not just to pass an amendment for the sake of a political position or a posture for the people back home, but to write a constitutional provision which truly expresses the will of this body that will endure for the generations to come and not be temporal or temporary.

Mr. President, in 1982 this body passed a constitutional amendment to balance the budget and I strongly supported that amendment. I felt it would go a long way in restoring fiscal responsibility to our Government.

I support the amendment that is before us today and will vote for it if it is not amended simply because I agree with the sponsors of the amendment that it is better that we do this than do nothing. But I still believe it is important for us to do the best we possibly can in fashioning a constitutional provision which will endure and not simply be temporary.

Mr. President, everyone who has looked at this issue over the last several years will recognize that the American public are saying that it is time for us to get our fiscal house in order, hence, the movement for an amendment. But they are also telling us cut the size and expense of Government. They are not telling us increase the size and cost of Government. They are not telling us balance the budget by raising taxes. They are telling us to balance the budget by reducing expenditures.

That is what Gramm-Rudman-Hollings implies and certainly tilts it in that direction. Although it does not say that you cannot balance the budget by raising taxes, it certainly tilts the argument in that direction.

What I and Senator MATTINGLY are trying to do by this amendment is limit the amount of spending that the Government can do as a percentage of national income.

When this body, by a vote of 69 Members, voted for a constitutional amendment in 1982, it had such a limitation in it. It was phrased a little differently than this because it would ratchet spending down against the peg of current revenues.

Right now revenues are slightly less than 19 percent, actually by estimates now 18.6 percent of national income. Expenditures are at 24 percent of national income, and the gap between those two is the measure of our deficit.

The American public is asking today, are you going to balance the budget and reduce that deficit and if so are you going to do it by increasing the burden of taxation, or are you going to do it by reducing the burden of Government?

Our amendment would say try to strike a median between the positions taken by several different groups across the country, by saying ratchet the expenditures down until they reach 20 percent—not the current standard of 18.6 percent—but 20 percent of national income. And do that by 1-percent increments which in the judgment of my cosponsor and myself matches the thrust and the process under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

It would allow us to not only get to a balanced budget, according to that schedule, but once having achieved that balanced budget, maintain it, but at the same time put a constitutional cap on the amount of money that can be taken through taxation and charges to finance and run this Government.

I am mindful, Mr. President, that some will say this is not necessary. I am mindful, Mr. President, that some said it was not necessary to worry about the scope of income tax when it was passed in 1913.

Mr. President, in 1982 this body passed a constitutional amendment to balance the budget. I strongly supported that measure and felt it would go a long way in restoring fiscal responsibility to our Government. However, as with any compromise, there were imperfections. We can all agree that it is imperative that the Federal Government adopt and stick to a policy of spending no more than it takes in as revenue, but the way to accomplish that goal is under constant scrutiny.

I rise in support of the pending measure but I must again point out, as I did in 1982, that an important consideration is being overlooked. Not only should we protect the American public from future economic chaos brought on by deficit spending, but we should insure the American public that we are committed to stopping the continual encroachment and growth of the Federal Government in the national economy.

The Thurmond-Hatch-DeConcini-Simon substitute to Senate Joint Resolution 225, does not include provisions to limit the size of Government. Theoretically, we could have a balanced budget and have the Government taking more than 50 percent of the national income. I think we all agree that the Government should not have the controlling interest in our free-market economy. The question we must ask ourselves is at what point do we say no; at what point do we put our foot down to further Government intervention?

A review of the past several years gives us a guide to make this decision. As early as 1940 the total receipts to the Federal Government totaled only 6.8 percent of GNP. Since that time the annual percentage of GNP taken by the Federal Government has fluctuated. It reached a high of 21.7 percent at the end of World War II. The average over the 46-year time span is 17.48 percent. In 1985, it reached only 18.6 percent. Out year estimates show an increase of 19 percent in 1990 and then a gradual decline to around 18 percent.

Mr. President, Prof. Milton Friedman, Nobel Prize winner in economics, stated in a 1983 Atlantic Monthly article that "* * * while I would prefer that the budget be balanced, I would rather have Government spend $500 billion and run a deficit of $100 billion than have it spend $800 billion with a balanced budget. It matters greatly how the budget is balanced, whether by cutting spending or by raising taxes." I share Professor Friedman's views that it matters greatly how the budget is balanced.

In 1982, 69 Members of this body voted for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget which included a tax or spending limitation. The compromise before us today does not include such a measure. It does require a constitutional majority of both Houses to increase revenues, but it does not limit the potential growth of Government. Our amendment would place an overall cap on outlays. This cap would be tied to national income so growth could not increase faster than the economy grows.

This amendment requires that outlays for a fiscal year shall not exceed an amount greater than 20 percent and provides a mechanism which would reduce outlays to this level. In 1985, total outlays equaled 24 percent of GNP. If this amendment is adopted, outlays would have to be reduced by 1 percent a year until outlays reach 20 percent of national income. Therefore, we would reach the 20-percent cap in 4 years. In addition, this amendment would place a cap on the overall size of the Federal Government and the degree of its involvement in the economy.

Mr. President, I sense, as many of my colleagues do, that the American people feel that this constitutional amendment is a superficial gesture by Congress that is riddled with loopholes and inequities that will easily be bypassed. Government spending is bleeding our Nation dry and limiting the size of Government is essential if we are to keep the economy growing. Congress has been unable to address the problem of deficit spending. The balanced budget amendment is a solution, but it creates an overwhelming temptation to levy additional taxes.

This amendment would put an end to constant growth.

I saw the irresponsible direction Government spending was taking as a freshman Congressman and supported a measure in the 90th Congress to require a single appropriations bill so that we might more closely examine total Government spending and facilitate its control. Throughout my service in Congress, I have supported legislation to limit expenditures from exceeding revenues. For too long we have failed in any attempt to set spending priorities for the Government. Instead, we have appropriated for the collective priority of everyone, every Member and every special interest. Unfortunately, even if this constitutional amendment is passed and is ratified, I still question whether spending would be controlled.

Certainly we could balance the budget by taxing our citizens at a rate of 60 or 80 percent but what would that accomplish? What will a further tax burden do to an already fragile economy? Unless we continue to change the direction of this country, government at all levels will take an ever increasing percent of every dollar earned. High taxes are choking the economy by penalizing productivity, thrift, and investment.

If we look back to the 1950's and 1960's when Federal spending took a smaller share of our economy, we were much more productive. In the 1960's Federal spending was about 18 percent of our GNP. During this period our economy, as it is measured by GNP, grew 6.72 percent. In the seventies during Congress freewheeling spending spree, Federal spending as a percentage of GNP exceeded 20 percent and at the same time our inflation rate was above 7 percent and the growth of our economy was only 3 percent. There is no doubt that as Federal spending consumes more and more of our economy we are less productive and we turn to inflationary policies to make up the difference.

We must realize that money expenditures do not solve social problems. The world's longest experiment conducted on this subject by this body has failed and we should learn from this. More money spent on a bad idea will not make that idea good. We have tried that so many times it should be obvious to all Senators that it does not work.

The amendment we are introducing today will go a long way to reaffirm valid financial standards. By reducing the Federal Government's share of national income 1 percent a year until it is back down to productive levels of 20 percent, we will go a long way to restore responsibility to government. It should be very clear to us that the American people feel that modern government is out of control. They are correct.

The time is now to draw the line and give the American people what they want and exactly what the economy needs: A budget that is balanced by taking the foot off of the neck of the economy.

Mr. President, sometimes individual examples are more persuasive than abstract principle. When leisure becomes more rewarding to a laboring person than does the after-tax rewards of their labor, they choose leisure. They are not stupid. The sawmill worker in northern Idaho suddenly was sick every other Friday afternoon and his employers naturally doubted whether that was fact, and they called him in and said, "Hank, we notice that you are sick every other Friday afternoon and we don't believe it." And he said, "Well, you are right. The first Friday afternoon I was sick. I could hardly get home and into bed. I was in bed all weekend, I could hardly get back to work on Monday morning, but when I got my check for that week it was only a few dollars less than if I had worked on Friday afternoon. And, frankly, my Friday afternoon is worth more than that to me."

Not a lazy American worker, a smart American doing what our system tells him to do, and that is to choose leisure as more rewarding to him than the after-tax rewards of labor.

That is what this amendment is all about, to try to get spending back down to the limits where Americans begin to see that the rewards of labor are more important to them than the rewards of leisure. We will never attain that in our system as long as the burden of taxation continues to rise. As important as the amendment is as reported by the Judiciary Committee, it does not do all of the job that needs to be done because spending can continue to rise under the amendment.

I think the Senator from Utah and the Senator from South Carolina are to be commended highly for having gotten this bill to the floor, and I do not mean to subtract that at all. I think that the conclusion that I must reach is that this amendment is crafted the way it is, without a limitation on spending, upon a judgment of the people that are involved in getting it passed that to go further would guarantee its defeat rather than its passage.

So, Mr. President, while I strongly support the amendment, I also believe very strongly that there should be a limitation on the amount of money the Government could spend, rather than just the requirement that the budget be balanced, even though it may be by ever-increasing levels of taxation.

There are those who tell us that we are undertaxed, that the American public pays less than other countries do. But that is one of the unique aspects of the American scene—that we are not like other countries. We are free people, and we cherish our freedom. We do not like the idea of government taking away from us, as a matter of right, more than half of all we make, and that is what government at all levels is doing today.

I cherish the thought that a free people, working in a free society, are more productive as well as more free. While other societies may opt for less freedom and may accept higher burdens of taxation, that is not the American way, and I hope it never will be.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] be added as an original cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, the amendment that the distinguished Senator from Idaho, Senator MCCLURE and myself are offering goes to the very heart of our Constitution as a document that outlines and limits the power and authority of the Federal Government.

The amendment limits annual spending outlays at 20 percent of national income, in doing so, it makes it clear that the role and the intrusion of the Federal Government into the economic affairs of its citizens is not unlimited; that there are boundaries to the amount of income that Washington can extract from the people. Our amendment makes the point that our economic problems, for the most part, have been created not simply by deficit spending, but by excessive Government spending.

Let me expand on that statement. Prof. Milton Friedman in the committee report, Senate Report 99-162, that accompanied Senate Joint Resolution 13, the balanced budget and tax limitation amendment, said:

> I would rather have Government spend $500 billion and run a deficit of $100 billion than have it spend $800 billion with a balanced budget. It matters greatly how the budget is balanced, whether by cutting spending or by raising taxes.

The Mattingly-McClure amendment establishes a process by which total annual outlays as a percentage of national income are reduced by 1 percent a year until they do not exceed 20 percent. As most of my colleagues know, outlays during fiscal year 1985 according to the historical tables that were submitted with the President's fiscal year 1987 budget, were 24 percent of our country's gross national product. Just 10 years ago, in fiscal year 1975, they were 21.8 percent of gross national product and 20 years ago in 1965, they were 17.6 percent of gross national product.

II period of the fifties and sixties America experienced enormous economic growth. That growth averaged between 4 and 7 percent with an average inflation around 2 percent. During that same period, the level of Government spending was between 18 and 20 percent of the gross national product.

There is another reason for the 20-percent level. At 20 percent of the gross national product, each American worker must work 1 day of each week to produce the goods and services that pay for the Federal budget. The efforts of 1 day a week will go to maintain the Federal Government. I ask my colleagues in the Senate to reflect on this fact and ask themselves, isn't 1 day a week enough to pay for the Federal Government? Should the American taxpayer have to labor for 2 days out of every 5 for the Federal Government? Must the taxpayer wait until Wednesday of each week before he or she can take home any of that paycheck?

Our amendment would prevent a budget being brought into balance by ever increasing rates of taxation. Without such protection, Federal spending could continue to soar and Congress could use this balanced budget amendment as a rational to explain to the electorate why higher taxes were necessary. The responsibility for higher taxes could be ever so subtlely shifted from the individual decisions of the elected representatives of the people to the budget balancing requirement of the constitution.

I salute the efforts that have been made on this proposal by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND, and Senator HATCH, the chairman of the Constitution Subcommittee. I know of the contribution that has been made by Senators DECONCINI and SIMON and of the delicate consensus that has been put together on behalf of this constitutional amendment proposal.

I appreciate those efforts, but it is my belief that without the type of limitation proposed in our amendment, the balanced budget concept is open to abuse. If the Members of Congress lacked the courage to make the spending cuts necessary to bring about a balanced budget, major tax increases would be the result. Members of Congress could then vote for the tax increase and point to the balanced budget amendment and say "The Constitution made me do it."

The McClure-Mattingly amendment strengthens the proposal and increases its chances of actually bringing about the structural reforms that are recognized as being so necessary to our economic well-being. This amendment would make certain that the Federal Government does not continue to take an ever-increasing amount of the income generated in our country.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. MCCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. MATTINGLY. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. MCCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] be added as an original cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment offered by Senator MCCLURE and Senator MATTINGLY. It proposes to improve what will be a historic check upon the appetites, however well intentioned, of the Congress and future administrations in the interest of the American people. What is proposed here is a very simple idea without which I think this will be a less effective amendment and one which, as Senator MATTINGLY has pointed out, does pose some risk that we will achieve balance not by exercising discipline upon that appetite but by giving grain to it and feeding it with excessive taxation.

Let me suggest, Mr. President, that what we are proposing here is by no means an anomaly. It is not beyond the common experience of other governmental agencies. There are several agencies throughout the Nation, States, local governments, which have imposed upon themselves, or had imposed upon them by vote of their constituents, the kind of reasonable spending limits that is in fact proposed in this amendment.

In my home State of California, there has been not only a revenue limitation imposed by a vote of the people, but, additionally, a subsequent vote of the people imposed a spending limit. Prior to that occurring in my own home city, my city council, during the time that I was mayor, offered a similar amendment to our own charter. We said that there could be growth beyond a baseline only in an amount that was really geared to not inflation but three-quarters of inflation and actual population growth.

The purpose of that was, very simply, to see to it that, whatever our good intentions and whatever the increase in assessed valuation of the real property that was our tax base, we would not give grain to that good intention and exploit increased assessed valuation by taking too much from homeowners.

Mr. President, I cite that experience simply to make the point: My city, in consequence of that decision, did not come upon disastrous times, as predicted by all those who opposed that measure. To the contrary, that city and its economy flourished and became more attractive to those seeking to bring employment to it. New companies brought new jobs in consequence of an exhibited attitude on the part of the people and their elected officials to not engage in excessive taxation and excessive spending.

So, Mr. President, let me commend the effort not only by those who have brought this constitutional amendment proposal to the floor, but I would urge that they and others improve upon it by accepting the amendment offered by Senator MCCLURE, Senator MATTINGLY, myself, and Senator ZORINSKY. It will not destroy the hopes of those who seek to bring about a balance in our budgeting. Rather, it will simply add an additional tool to provide the constraint which Congress and a succession of administrations have historically been unable to impose upon themselves.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, first, I wish to pay my respects and compliments to Senator THURMOND, Senator HATCH, Senator DECONCINI, and those on the other side of the aisle who worked long and hard to bring this amendment to the floor.

Mr. President, in the last Gallup Poll, 9 out of every 10 Americans said they believed the Federal deficit is a serious threat to the Nation's economy. This should come as no surprise. The American people have been telling us about these fears of the deficit for over a decade. Since 1975, States have been petitioning Congress to pass a balanced budget amendment for them to ratify.

Mr. President, let me just review what we have done. In 1978, we passed the Byrd-Grassley amendment—that is Harry Byrd and CHARLES GRASSLEY, then a Member of the other body—which became Public Law 94-435 that statutorily required a balanced budget in 1981. You all know that it did not work.

In 1979, we passed Public Law 96-5 that said "Congress shall balance the budget," period. That did not work.

In 1980, we passed Public Law 96-389 that said "Congress reaffirms its commitment to balance the Federal budget beginning with fiscal year 1981." The response to that was a $200 billion deficit, so it did not work.

In 1985, we had the largest Federal deficit in history. In August, we became a net debtor Nation for the first time in 100 years. We ran the largest trade deficit in our Nation's history.

Mr. President, the question before us is not whether we should pass a balanced budget amendment or not. The question is, can we develop one that is better than the one before us?

I take a back seat to no one on fiscal conservatirsm. And I want to compliment Senator HATCH and Senator DECONCINI. I think they have done the best they could do. I also compliment those of my colleagues who are working to improve this amendment

If we are truly serious about bringing deficits under control, we must pass a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. We must pass this constitutional amendment in this Chamber, pass it in the other body, and do our best to help it be ratified throughout the country by the 50 States. We must shackle Congress with the chains of the Constitution so that we will no longer be tempted to spend the public's money.

To argue that we have other statutory laws contradicts the lessons of history. Those who say a balanced budget should not be part of the Constitution might do well to reflect on what Thomas Jefferson said in a letter in 1793:

I place the economy as among the first and most important virtues and the public debt as the greatest danger.

I wish it were possible to obtain a single amendment to our Consitition. I would be willing to depend on that for the reduction of our Government to the genuine principles of our Constitution. I mean an additional article taking from the Federal Government the power of borrowing.

The amendment before us today may not be perfect. I happen to think the amendment pending to the amendment that Senator HATCH brought to the floor would be an improvement. But I want to say that no compromise is ever perfect. As far as the balanced budget amendment, I am going to support the amendment with or without the amendment that is now pending before us.

The people overwhelmingly demand that we pass a balanced budget amendment to their Constitution. Everywhere I go in my State, people come up to me and ask the question: "When is Congress going to balance the budget? When will we see an end to deficit spending?"

I think Congress made it clear, with statutory laws passed in 1978, 1979, 1980, and 1985, that statutory laws always allow wiggle room for those in the Congress. Despite these statutory laws, we have continued to further burden the working Americans with a growing national debt.

Mr. President, We have reached a point now where each and every American has to pay $750 per capita to pay their share of the interest on the national debt. So that means the working family of four has to pay $3,000 a year just to pay its share of servicing the debt. Whether they pay it in direct taxes or indirect taxes, it comes out of their sweat, blood, tears, labors, efforts, capital, and savings. It comes out of their future. I think it is most important that we pass this amendment so we can, once and for all, get the Government on a track like most of the State governments, like most of the local governments in this country, and like the household budgets in this country.

Finally, I wish to ask those who believe we can continue on this road of fiscal irresponsibility to explain to the farmers in my State, or in other States—Idaho is not unique in the fact that our farmers are in bad trouble—why the Government is exempt from the laws of the economy; why the Government can somehow go on and keep borrowing money and keep spending money when the farmers are not able to do it; why the Government continues to spend what it does not have, while they must see their farms auctioned off because real interest rates are too high and their products cannot compete overseas?

If anyone believes deficits can continue while the Federal interest payment slowly becomes the largest item in the Federal budget, I would like to ask them to come with me to Idaho and talk to some of the sawmill workers who have had pay cuts recently—those who are still lucky enough to have a job.

Mr. President, 659 sawmills that have closed in the Pacific Northwest, in Oregon, Washington, and Idaho in the last 5 or 6 years: 695 out of 2,000. A lot of that can be traced to high interest rates, big Government spending, and unfair competition from foreign timber producers.

So this is one of the reasons why I support this amendment. It is important for people. We are talking about the lives of families and people in this country. Those who would be opposed to a constitutional amendment to insist on a balanced fiscal policy by the Federal Government should come and explain to the Idaho miners why we are funding their competition in other parts of the world. Through the international banks that we finance, like the World Bank, the IMF, and others, we are directly financing their competition.

These people deserve to have their Congress allow them to correct their Nation's most serious problem. In my judgment, Mr. President, it is time we listened to the people. It is time we changed this Congress' miserable record on this issue. We should and we must heed the words of the Founding Fathers, and we must pass this balanced budget amendment.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I would like to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the March 11, 1986, Wall Street Journal article by Mr. James Davidson, chairman of the National Taxpayers Union. I ask my colleagues to read this article.

Mr. President, the title of the article says it all: "Put Gramm-Rudman in Stone."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 11, 1986]

PUT GRAMM-RUDMAN IN STONE

(By James D. Davidson)

We all know the scene from the "Peanuts" comic strip where Lucy asks Charlie Brown to kick the football. The last time, and every time before that, Lucy jerked the ball away at the last minute, and Charlie Brown landed flat on his back. Charlie wants to believe Lucy when she says this time will be different. But what happens?

It's the same old Lucy—and Charlie Brown lands on his back once again.

Now picture this scene. "We promise," says Congress. "We'll trim these deficits. We'll balance the budget. Just give us one more chance. Let's follow the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings plan to eliminate deficits by 1991."

We have heard repeated promises from our nation's leaders about how the budget will be balanced by some certain date—usually, as here, a date four or five years in the future. This time, Congress and the president have a law reinforcing this promise with a new budget process designed to fulfill it. The mood of Washington appears to have changed.

But—wait a minute here. A federal court has just declared the law's key enforcement mechanism unconstitutional. Congress will miss the first-year (1986) deficit reduction target by roughly $36 billion. The president and his Democratic adversaries are singing the same old songs about how their priorities are not going to be cut, no matter what. More than half the budget—including Social Security and other huge entitlement programs—is declared off-limits entirely. And a growing chorus is complaining that the required cuts would be, well, just too painful, and maybe we should learn to live with hefty deficits well into the 1990s.

In the face of all this, should the American people play Charlie Brown?

Congress passed a balanced-budget statute once before, amid much hoopla, in 1978. That law promised to eliminate deficits by 1981. Seven days into the 1981 fiscal year, it was quietly repealed.

But Congress need never actually repeal a balanced-budget statute to run a deficit. When Congress passes a budget-busting law that conflicts with a previous law, that old law is implicitly repealed and superseded, pure and simple. No Congress can bind any succeeding Congress.

The warning signals are plain to see. The special treatment accorded to Social Security, veterans benefits and other entitlement programs may soon be extended to other categories of programs. Education. Farm programs. Foreign aid. Recall the political undertow of last summer's budget resolution. Whatever chance Congress had for meaningful deficit reduction lay in a compromise package that would have frozen spending for entitlements and defense. The deal was both or neither. It turned out to be neither.

When it comes to budget deficits, Congress may have reached the same stage Neville Chamberlain did when he belatedly realized that "peace in our time" wouldn't work. But we see no signs of a Churchillian mood. Congress still thinks it can find an easy way out.

Some members hope that budget deficits will go away. Recent projections show the deficit will (under current programs) decline to "only" $120 billion by 1990. But these rest on so many hopeful assumptions about the economy and spending patterns that we could easily be back to $200 billion "as far as the eye can see."

The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings plan may help phase in a balanced budget, but only if it can be made binding in some way. The best way would be to enact the balanced-budget amendment to the U.S. Constitution. That couldn't be overridden by a Congress that finds budget-cutting impolitic.

This amendment was first proposed back in 1975. In that year, the national debt was one-third what it is today. Annual budget deficits were about one-fourth their present dimensions. And we were spending one-sixth as much as we do today on gross interest for the national debt. The delay has been costly—especially for America's children, who 10 years later owe an extra $60,000 in taxes just to pay the interest on what has already been borrowed.

What the balanced-budget amendment would do is force an uncluttered three-fifths vote to authorize deficits. Tax increases would require a constitutional majority of each house of Congress.

This would add accountability. If the American people want balanced budgets at responsible levels of taxation—and we know they do—they could pay attention to how their legislators vote on these questions. Members would not be able to conceal their true positions on deficits and taxes as they do today. If the American people are determined enough to reward or penalize incumbents accordingly on Election Day, we will indeed see a balanced budget before long.

Mr. SYMMS. I yield the floor.

Mr. BIDEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I will make a few brief remarks.

Mr. President, throughout my service in the Senate, I have sought a mechanism that would force Congress to act on deficits. I have proposed legislative changes to that end, beginning in 1975 with measures to sunset Government programs. In recent years, I have carefully examined several constitutional proposals and even offered one myself.

When the Judiciary Committee voted on balanced budget proposals last July, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings had not yet been conceived, let alone adopted. That statutory scheme is a viable fiscal policy tool which, I believe, can force Congress and the President to eliminate the deficits that have plagued us for much too long. That is why I voted for it. While Gramm-Rudman-Hollings has flaws, it is working.

We must give the concept of a mandated deficit reduction law a chance before we embark on the most permanent but uncertain road of all—amending the Constitution.

We will know within a year how effective Gramm-Rudman-Hollings can be in eliminating deficits. Any further action on deficit reduction mechanisms, such as the one before us, should be based on our experience under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. We will then have a measure as to how well a legislative mechanism can work. It is certainly more desirable to tailor any budget process to the needs of the time than to be locked into a constitutional amendment that is difficult to modify when it needs change.

Although it is far from perfect, I believe that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will eventually prove to have been a wiser choice than any constitutional amendment. I recognized long ago the frustrations that fuel the drive to amend the Constitution in order to balance the budget. During floor debate on a balanced budget constitutional amendment in August 1982, I noted that Congress is unable to discipline itself. We are all looking for mechanical devices to force us to do what is very difficult to do; that is, tell interest groups "no," whether they be defense or social programs or whatever they happen to be.

Later, in September 1984, during a Judiciary Committee meeting considered a balanced budget amendment, I said that the strongest argument for the amendment, and one that I subscribed to, is that we, in fact, must have a legislative and/or constitutional mechanism written into the law or the Constitution that requires us to do what is the most difficult thing for us to do in this Congress and is the most difficult thing for Presidents to do.

But now we have a potentially effective legislative mechanism in hand, while the constitutional amendment before us cannot become effective before 1991. Therefore, its adoption at this particular moment is not critical. We should wait for results from what is already in place.

The first freestanding sunset bill, which I introduced in 1975, would have terminated most Federal spending programs on a periodic schedule, to allow a review of program effectiveness. In its time, sunset was as controversial as Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is today. Had we adopted sunset legislation then, we might well have avoided many of today's problems.

I also introduced legislation to slow the creation of tax preferences and loopholes that offer special tax breaks to small groups of individuals or corporations, which the vast majority of taxpayers do not enjoy. My proposal also contained a provision for periodic review of all such tax provisions. Such a proposal could well have prevented the massive losses of revenues which plague our budget process and thereby reduced the levels of today's deficits.

Over the years, I supported many other efforts to control deficits. In 1985 and again in 1986, I offered, with Senators GRASSLEY, KASSEBAUM, and BAUCUS, a budget freeze which could have made a large dent in our current deficit problem.

I am convinced that the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings proposal represents a workable process for forcing deficit reduction. It is unlikely that the automatic sequester process will ever take effect for fiscal year 1987 or beyond. Instead, I believe that Congress will adopt a fiscal program that will achieve the target of a balanced budget by 1991.

In suggesting that we wait for results under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, I do not agree with those who argue that deficits have become less of a problem than in prior years. They have not. Nor will they until Congress acts. The Congressional Budget Office now projects that deficits may decline over the next 5 years, perhaps reaching $104 billion by 1991. Much of the reason for these declining deficit projections relates to lower estimates of future spending which may or may not prove accurate. The more favorable CBO estimate also has to do with favorable economic estimates for the next 5 years, which also may or may not turn out to be accurate.

So when you look carefully at the figures, it is clear that the actual situation in which we find ourselves has improved little. Only the artificial baseline has changed, not the reality. We still need that action-forcing mechanism I have been seeking for the past 13 years. But I believe that we may now have that mechanism. It is true that it will take 5 years to reach a balanced budget. But I know of no economist who seriously believes that such great economic stimulus as a $200 billion deficit should be eliminated more quickly.

My reservations about the balanced budget amendment before us are strengthened by the fact that it would not be an effective addition to our deficit-fighting measures. I expressed these reservations when I voted to report the original Senate Joint Resolution 225 for floor action. Nothing has happened since then to alleviate those reservations.

First, and most fundamentally, the only national security exception in this proposal requires the existence of a declaration of war. Such a provision is too restrictive and unrealistic in these perilous times. The threats against which we must protect ourself are less clear cut than a formal state of war, but no less dangerous. We must be ready to protect ourselves against the development of new weapons systems that threaten our security. We must be prepared to carry out military missions short of all-out conflict which are essential to our security, and we must be able to react swiftly and effectively to situations which threaten American lives. In addition, there are economic threats that may pose as much of a danger to our national security as any military action. I believe it is most unwise to gamble the future security of this country on obtaining a three-fifths vote to authorize any deficit that may be necessary.

Senator HEFLIN's efforts in the Judiciary Committee, and here on the Senate floor, to broaden the national security provisions have not succeeded. This is a most serious defect in this balanced budget mechanism.

Second, Mr. President, I am concerned that this amendment may be interpreted in the future as expanding the President's impoundment powers. The amendment does not say that, of course. The amendment does say, however, that outlays shall not exceed receipts. And rate of outlays is not directly controlled by Congress. It is the executive branch that primarily controls outlays. It is hard to escape the presumption that the President will have a prime responsibility in enforcing this amendment. The committee report reinforces this feeling when it says: "One possible way to control this problem is through Presidential action."

Finally, the supporters of this amendment have offered no explanation of what practical means can be found to control the levels of spending or receipts. On the spending side, a 1 percent estimating error means a $10 billion deficit. On the receipts side, a recession can lead to a rapid decline in receipts collection—1982 presents a good example of what can happen. For that year, the President overestimated revenues by $33 billion, while underestimating spending by $33 billion also. In its budget for that year, Congress overstimated revenues by $40 billion, while underestimating spending by $33 billion; 1982 was a difficult economic year, but we can expect others in the future. The amendment offers no practical means of dealing with such uncertainties, which are bound to arise.

I listened with great interest to my colleague from Idaho suggesting that we now chisel in granite what in fact has been legislated.

I always think it is better if we can solve a problem by a piece of legislation rather than a constitutional amendment. We should do it.

I suggest to all that I believe this is premature. We are now wrestling with the ability to deal with the implementation of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, which I voted for and support.

I think it is not appropriate for us to be amending the Constitution at this moment. If, in a year from now, it is not working, then I am prepared to come back and look at this. But now let us deal with what we have before us. Let us not chisel anything in stone or granite until we know whether or not it works. It seems to me we have an opportunity to find that out.

Mr. METZENBAUM and Mr. SIMON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I understand the desire to proceed quickly, and I also want to accommodate my friend from Maryland. I want to speak briefly in opposition to this well-motivated amendment. I agree with my friend from Idaho, Senator SYMMS, about what is happening to the individual. Incidentally, those figures now have gone up to $820 per person from $750 per person.

This is a well-motivated amendment but it is an amendment that should not pass. There are two basic difficulties with it. No. 1, it complicates an already difficult task of getting a two-thirds majority in this body to vote for it. It makes it infinitely more difficult to pass over in the House side.

Second, none of us knows what is going to happen 5 years from now, or 10 years from now. For example, if 5 years from now or 10 years from now we see that the roads and bridges of our country need repair and we vote a 10-cent increase in the gasoline tax, we would then have to reduce other expenditures, other revenue, Social Security, whatever it might be, and I really think that is not the direction we ought to be going.

I just think that there is not a single person here who knows what is going to happen 5 years from now, 10 years from now, much less 20 or 30 years from now. I strongly urge that we defeat this amendment. Despite the good motivation of the sponsors, it is not sound public policy.

Mr. DOMENICI and Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I wonder if I can ask the distinguished prime sponsor of the amendment a couple of questions.

Might I ask my friend, the Senator from Idaho, do I understand that, in talking about 20 percent of GNP——

Mr. McCLURE. The language of the amendment is 20 percent of national income, and, if the Senator will refer back to the discussions around the balanced budget constitutional amendment report in 1982, there is an extensive discussion of what that means.

Mr. DOMENICI. So whatever that definition is, am I correct that we are charged with getting there?

Mr. McCLURE. The Senator is correct—not only charged, but mandated.

Mr. DOMENICI. We are mandated to get there in a manner by reducing what annually?

Mr. McCLURE. Reduce outlays by 1 percent of national income per year until we have reduced from the current 24 percent of GNP as defined today down to 20 percent of national income.

Mr. DOMENICI. And the Congress is going to have to do that, as the Senator understands the amendment?

Mr. McCLURE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. Do I understand that all outlays of the Government are the same? Are outlays outlays; that is, Social Security checks are outlays?

Mr. McCLURE. They are outlays.

Mr. DOMENICI. And what we spend for the highways are outlays?

Mr. McCLURE. Those are outlays.

Mr. DOMENICI. And to the extent that the definition of the percentage, the 20 percent, to the extent that that is measured in some kind of revenues here, all revenues are the same, whether they are revenues for Social Security or revenues for the trust fund for highways?

Mr. McCLURE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. So that what we are saying is we could end up with Social Security and Medicare growing proportionately as they have doubled in the past 15 years, if we do not touch them, then we have to cut the other things to get to that 20 percent?

Mr. McCLURE. The Senator would be correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator withhold his motion. I would like to address this amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM Then I will have other amendments to offer.

Mr. HATCH. Then I will have 10 other amendments.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to be heard for 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the only reason I am moving to table is I do not care whether the amendment is agreed to or not, but we have been trying all afternoon to bring debate to a close and have final passage on this constitutional amendment. We know one Member wants to get away. There has been delay and delay from the proponents. The only reason I am moving to lay it on the table is so that we might move forward and have a final vote tonight.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I am asking the Senator, as one of the key proponents of this amendment and as chairman of the Constitution Subcommittee, who has had to handle this from the beginning, all the way through the end, along with Senators THURMOND, DECONCINI, and SIMON, to withhold his motion to table until I make my remarks on this. Then he can move to table. All I want to do——

Mr. METZENBAUM. Can the Senator assure us there will be a final vote up or down on passage soon?

Mr. HATCH. I cannot answer that. All I want to ask is that I be permitted to make my remarks. If he does not permit me, it will be the first time in the Senate when a Senator has prevented another Senator from speaking before making such a motion.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator. The Senator knows I have worked hard all afternoon to try to bring this to a vote. I understand there may be people on our side having trouble meeting their schedule. It may come to a point where we have to agree on a time certain, go to third reading, and vote. All I can say is that we are trying to accommodate every Senator on this floor. This is an important amendment. I hope all 100 Senators can understand that. It is the Senator's side that we are trying to accommodate.

I understand from the majority leader that there may be some on our side who will be gone. We cannot afford any of ours to be gone. It will be a close vote.

With regard to the McClure-Mattingly amendment, as I read the amendment, it basically provides for a ratcheting down on a 1-percent national income until you reach the 20 percent of gross national product for such fiscal year.

I think this would be totally inconsistent with the intent of Senate Joint Resolution 225 to create a more neutral budget process, one that is not biased toward higher spending and taxes, but one that is equally unbiased toward lower spending and taxes.

The proposed amendment would sharply skew the system in favor of lower spending and taxes.

What we are trying to do is even up the system with this constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget or at least push toward a balanced budget.

While I personally support a spending limit based on a percentage of the GNP, I do not believe that it is appropriate to incorporate it in the Constitution. The purpose of Senate Joint Resolution 225, I emphasize again, is to create neutrality and to eliminate biases one way or the other.

The premise of the present constitutional amendment is the Congress should not be able to increase spending without voting to pay for such spending.

Basically, I cannot disagree with this amendment, except this is not the time to bring it to the floor.

If Congress is willing to vote for spending, then it is not the business of the Constitution to prevent the elected representatives of the people from doing it.

The intent, I am sure, is well intentioned.

I will just say this: To bring it to the floor at this particular time and try to substitute for the amendment that is a consensus amendment, I think, is a mistake.

In this sense, Senate Joint Resolution 225 does contain a spending limit. It is not an absolute limit based on—Mr. President, could I have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will be order in the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. In this sense, Senate Joint Resolution 225 does contain a spending limit. It is not an absolute limit based on GNP or any other external and uncontrollable limit derived from the principle that Congress will be required to vote affirmatively for new taxes to fund any new spending. That is a very real limit.

No. 1, one of the major objections I have to this amendment is not constitutional language in any sense of the word. Those who work with constitutional language, I think, would have to agree.

Two, Senate Joint Resolution 225 establishes a norm that the budget must be balanced. It does not dictate to future Congresses in perpetuity how those representatives must achieve that mandate.

This addition, however, would tie the hands of future Congresses.

Complex formulas of GNP or percentages, of the national income or ratios to national income would instead dictate what Congress could do.

Three, there have been absolutely no hearings or legislative history as to the meaning of terms. The authors of this amendment could have brought it to the Senate Judiciary Committee and asked for hearings on this matter, but they did not. I cannot blame them for bringing it now, and they have every right to do so. But I do believe, if we are going to have an amendment like this, it flies in the face of the bipartisan consensus that we have, and certainly, it seems to me, comes at too late a date because there have not been extensive legislative hearings on the meaning of terms as defined in this particular amendment.

I do not want to find fault with the authors of this amendment because I know they are sincere. I know they mean well, and I know their approach may be a valid approach down the line. But so is the approach that we have before the Senate at this time in the Thurmond constitutional amendment that has been filed as a substitute to Senate Joint Resolution 225.

With that, I hope that everybody in the Senate will vote down this amendment and we can go from there.

Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, let me respond only to the latter part of what the Senator has said as to whether or not the committee has had the opportunity to consider and discuss this particular amendment.

Mr. President, I know it is not really quite fair, but I would call the Senator's attention to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, of which he is a distinguished member, on Senate Joint Resolution 13, the additional minority views, the 99th Congress, first session, which was published on October 23, 1985.

It discusses this subject matter and the discussions and deliberations of the Judiciary Committee with respect to this subject matter.

For the Senator to indicate that they simply have not had a chance to discuss is disingenuous in the extreme.

Mr. MATTINGLY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MATTINGLY. In response to the distinguished Senator from Utah, Mr. President, I would like to point out that, in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary that accompanied Senate Joint Resolution 13, then professor, and now U.S. Circuit Court Judge Robert Bork was quoted as saying:

> The long-term growth of Government's share of national wealth is a serious near-term threat to the vitality of the economy. Less obviously perhaps, rising Government spending is a long-term threat to American political freedom.

So I just point out that in the Judiciary Committee's own report, it is noted that the Federal share of the national income is too great and that it should be reduced.

The Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Utah have referred to this amendment as well-intentioned, well-motivated, and a valid approach. I would urge them to support it.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, as the chairman of the Constitution Subcommittee, I do take some issue with the Senator from Idaho. Yes, we have discussed approximately 60 to 100 constitutional amendments to balance the budget since I have been on the Judiciary Committee. And since I have been chairman of the Constitution Subcommittee, I suppose we have gone through at least 40 constitutional amendments to mandate a balanced budget. I can tell you right here and now that I have never seen this amendment before today nor have I seen this particular concept before today. Nor have I seen this particular form of amendment before today, which is certainly not in the form of a constitutional amendment.

That is procedure, I admit. That is not substance, as far as that goes.

Mr. McCLURE. If the Senator will yield, he would agree, would he not, that there was a limitation discussed on the floor of the Senate in 1982——

Mr. HATCH. In the balanced budgets tax limitation amendment at that time, which was different from this.

Mr. McCLURE. But the concept was discussed.

Mr. HATCH. Yes, the concept was discussed but that is not the point of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. McCLURE. Would the Senator also agree that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary last fall reported Senate Joint Resolution 13?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator will agree to that.

Mr. McCLURE. And that the report on that included a discussion of what were total receipts, total outlays, national income, in the context of a concept exactly the same or substantially similar to that amendment now before us?

Mr. HATCH. There is no question that some of those concepts were discussed in Senate Joint Resolution 13. However, Senate Joint Resolution 13 dealt with receipts; not an increase in national income without a constitutional majority. It was a completely different concept. It certainly was not this concept at all.

Second, there is a lot of different language in here, and every time you have a word in a constitutional amendment, we go through untold difficulties with constitutional experts all over the country on these amendments. Every word has a particular meaning that is very difficult to define in this context and this shortened time period without having time to really look at it and determine just what the constitutional implications are.

Having gone through it time after time with constitutional amendments, I have to confess that having one brought at the last minute like this that has these kinds of implications, and which has a really different concept than what we had in Senate Joint Resolution 13, which we decided not to bring to the floor of the U.S. Senate, I think really mandates that this be voted down so we have time to examine it and also hold hearings on it.

Last but not least, Mr. President, we have worked for 10 years to get to a consensus amendment that we could do something with. Frankly, we have a consensus amendment. This would completely change the tenor of that amendment. We have no doubt that the Senators are sincere, that there are some good concepts here, but we would like not to have to change it this way.

Mr. President, I am prepared to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I shall take but a couple of minutes on this. I just want to say that we have worked long and hard to try to craft an amendment here that will accomplish the goal. The amendment that has been offered by these distinguished Senators, for both of whom I have the highest respect, I think is a complicated amendment. We ought to have a hearing on it and later it could be offered as a statute or as a constitutional amendment. But to bring it in here at this late date when we have had no hearing on it, I think, would be a mistake.

For that reason, Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to table.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we had already gotten the yeas and nays, I thought. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 87, nays 13—as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if I could have order, I might be able to indicate to my colleagues what the program will be for the remainder of the evening.

Mr. President, as I understand, there are two additional amendments to be offered to the balanced budget amendment which will be accepted by the managers of the bill, one by the distinguished Senator from Colorado, Senator ARMSTRONG, and one by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, Senator GORE.

Mr. THURMOND. And Senator EXON.

Mr. DOLE. And the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, Senator EXON.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, let us have order so we will be able to hear the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please retire from the well and the Senate will please be in order.

The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. At that time, following the adoption of those two amendments we would go to third reading and then there would be a unanimous-consent propounded that the vote occur on the adoption of Senate Joint Resolution 225 at 2 p.m. on Tuesday, March 25, 1986 and that paragraph 4 of rule XII be waived. So the vote would occur on final passage at that time.

If no one objects to that, the only other thing we would do this evening would be take up the committee funding resolutions.

I am prepared to suggest if there should be a request for a RECORD vote on that this evening we could have that vote tomorrow.

So we are down to the wire on committee funding. As I understand, Friday is sort of the last day we can fund the committee staff.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I know of the Armstrong amendment. It is my understanding that the Exon-Gore amendment is identical to the amendment that this body turned down, and that I offered yesterday, by a vote of 53 to 43, although they told me that they might change a word or two.

Is that in substance correct?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I do not know.

Mr. SIMON. If my colleague from Ohio will yield, there has been a substantial change in his amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Then I do not think the Senator can expect us to accept it without knowing what it is and without having an opportunity to vote on it. We certainly should know what is in the amendment.

What is the substantial change? Would the Senator tell me that?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Nebraska to respond to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, it seems to me that tempers are extremely short in this body at the present time. I have tried to calm the waters as best I can. Sometimes I stir the waters. I am in a calming procedure right now.

There has been considerable discussion over an amendment that would address the matter of the President submitting a balanced budget or stating reasons thereof to be incorporated into the amendment.

That was a suggestion that I had made, and I had several cosponsors to that.

I was basically convinced by my friend from Illinois and my friend from Utah that that should not be put into the amendment for reasons best known to them. I thought they were wrong at the time, but I did want to understand the amendment.

I was at the White House yesterday at the request of the President when we had a vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. Had I been here I would have voted that because I think it is basically a good amendment.

We have been trying to come up with some language here that would be acceptable basically because the managers of the bill want to get all the votes that they can, for obvious reasons. We could not come up with the correct language for reasons best known to those who could not come to an agreement.

Finally, everyone said let us accept the language of the Senator from Ohio, and I said in the spirit of cooperation and calming of the waters I agree, but I said I will not introduce or be a part of the introduction of a motion that was drafted and worded by any other Senator.

I have not made what respect I have in this body by stealing the wording of another Senator.

So I went to the Senator from Ohio, asked him if he would agree to minor word changes to be substantive enough to qualify as far as not being repetitious.

And the Senator from Ohio said he did not care to enter into such an agreement. We then offered to the Senator from Ohio, if we got unanimous consent to reconsider his motion, would he agree with that. And he said, "No, I will not agree with that."

With that attitude by the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Nebraska, rightly or wrongly, said, "Well, if that is his attitude, I will take his language, because I made the offer to him."

That agreement was agreed to by the junior Senator from Tennessee, who has been very active and supportive of the general efforts. And so, that is where we are and that basically is what the amendment is. We are making some changes that will be substantive enough to clear any problems from a procedural standpoint. But it basically is the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from Ohio that he now seems to oppose.

With that, in a few moments I will call up the amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am asking what it is. I am just asking what the changes are.

Mr. DOLE. I will be happy to get out of this.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Just tell me what the changes are and I could very well step aside. Show it to me.

Mr. DOLE. The best way to do that is if they are prepared to offer that amendment now.

Mr. EXON. The amendment is being retyped at this very moment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Why do we not go to the Armstrong amendment?

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Let me indicate to my colleagues that it might be in their interest to hang around just for a few moments to determine what that amendment is.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I would be perfectly agreeable if the Senator wants to go forward with his unanimous-consent request subject only to these two amendments.

Mr. DOLE. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the majority leader would yield, I would suggest to the majority leader, rather than having unanimous consent to vote on the 25th at 2 o'clock, that we make it at 4 o'clock. In my judgment, there have been some changes in the language which could drastically have changed some of the definitions that were contained in the conference report. I know the Armstrong amendment is to be added in, which, basically, I endeavored to try to get in the committee and I support, but I am not sure that I accomplish what he intends to do. I think the period of time will allow some scholarship and some study. It may well be that when we meet on Tuesday, knowing how Tuesdays go, there is not much that starts until about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. I think there needs to be 2 or 3 hours in the afternoon before you vote on this.

Mr. DOLE. I have no objection to that, if there are no other objections.

Mr. WEICKER. Reserving the right to object, I ask the majority leader and also the Senator from Alabama what is contemplated in his 2 hours of debate; not a period of time when further amendments could be offered prior to final vote? That is not what the Senator is asking for?

Mr. HEFLIN. It could well be there could be some amendments that have to clarify some language, I would say. In my judgment, they would be technical amendments.

Mr. WEICKER. I am not sure I could agree with that. I think this only exemplifies why you should not try to run the United States of America on a day-to-day basis through the Constitution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let us proceed with the amendments that are pending and see what happens after that.

AMENDMENT NO. 1665

(Purpose: To prohibit borrowing on the credit of the United States unless three-fifths of both Houses of Congress approve a waiver)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH], for himself, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. SIMON, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOREN, and Mr. GRAMM, proposes an amendment numbered 1665 to Amendment No. 1652.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment reads as follows:

On page 1, line 10, strike "," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Nor shall borrowing on the credit of the United States be authorized to finance an excess of outlays over receipts for any fiscal year,".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will please be order so the Senator can be heard.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send this amendment to the desk on behalf of Senators THURMOND, HATCH, DECONCINI, SIMON, ARMSTRONG, BOREN, and GRAMM. This is basically the Armstrong-Boren amendment that we have agreed to in language.

In 1982, the Senate adopted an amendment, authored by the Senator from Colorado, to require a three-fifths vote to increase the public debt.

This amendment I have just sent to the desk achieves, in more appropriate constitutional language, many objectives of the earlier Armstrong amendment and Senator ARMSTRONG has helped to write this.

Article I, section 8, states that the Congress has the authority to "borrow money on the credit of the United States." Unfortunately, this authority has been used to amass more than $2 trillion of public debt.

This amendment states that Congress shall not be empowered to authorize further borrowing on the credit of the United States unless three-fifths of both Houses provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts. In other words, if you want to lift the debt limit, you are going to have to have a three-fifths vote from here on in, assuming that this amendment passes and is ratified by three-quarters of the States.

If, for any reason, Congress anticipated that a fiscal year's financing might result in a deficit, Congress would have to authorize the specific excess of outlays over receipts and borrowing to fund the deficit by a three-fifths vote. The language "for any fiscal year" in my language is intended to clarify that this amendment does not ban borrowing within or during a fiscal year as long as no borrowing is necessary at year's end to reconcile outlays and receipts. This will allow the Government to deal with fluctuations in the way receipts are actually collected. Thus, the amendment would continue to operate on a fiscal year basis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator withhold for a moment?

Mr. HATCH. I would be delighted to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will there please be order in the Chamber? Senators will please retire to the cloakroom so the Senator from Utah may be heard. Will Senators please retire to the cloakroom?

The Senator will please withhold.

Mr. HATCH. I would be delighted to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will Senators and staff please retire to the cloakroom with their conversations until such time as the Senator from Utah is finished?

The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Chair.

As I pointed out, the amendment would continue to operate on a fiscal year basis. The Government would not need to shut down outlays in January because most taxpayers filed their returns in March. This language is flexible, it is workable, but it does forbid the increase of the statutory debt limit or other borrowing actions without a three-fifths authorization.

The intent is to preclude Congress from authorizing by debt limit increases or otherwise borrowing to finance a budget deficit. Under the operation of Senate Joint Resolution 225, with this change, Congress would most likely authorize borrowing within the same bill that authorizes a specific excess of outlays over receipts. This would require a three-fifths vote.

This amendment also has the virtue of using constitutional language. It also avoids freezing into the Constitution the notion of a public debt limit. This language should be read in the context of the entire language of Senate Joint Resolution 225. It does not forbid all borrowing of the Government without a three-fifths vote. It only requires a supermajority for borrowing in any fiscal year required to fund a deficit in that fiscal year.

This language will not end sound financial practices. It will restrain the practice of raising the public debt to accommodate endless borrowing.

In that regard, I want to thank the distinguished Senator from Colorado and the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, Senators ARMSTRONG and BOREN, and tell them that I think they have done the Senate and the constitutional process a service by putting this into the constitutional amendment that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina has proposed.

I also believe that Senator GRAMM has added a great deal to this as well. I believe it is a good amendment. I believe it strengthens the constitutional amendment. I believe it is in the best interests of the constitutional language, and I believe that most people in this country would like to see this type of a supermajority vote necessary in order to continue to raise the debt ceiling.

Mr. ARMSTRONG and Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I rise to express my appreciation to the Senator from Utah for developing this language in response to the concerns which the Senator from Oklahoma, [Mr. BOREN]; the Senator from Texas, [Mr. GRAMM]; and the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. HEFLIN]; and others have expressed.

I am really delighted by the resolution of this, not necessarily because I think this is the only formulation of language which would serve the intended purpose or even necessarily that it is the best possible formulation. But I think it is practical, I think it is workable, and the reason why I particularly want to express publicly my appreciation to our colleague from Utah is that he has been trying to get everybody on board the same bandwagon.

You have an enormous majority here that favors the general concept of a balanced budget amendment. But fallen to ORRIN HATCH is the task of trying to get a two-thirds majority behind some particular formulation of it. As one who has harassed him, nipped at his heels, phoned him, sent him letters, and insisted that we had to have something in there about the debt limit, I want to say to my brother, I am very grateful to him for doing it.

I want to take just 1 more minute to respond to a criticism that I anticipate that somehow this will be subject to interpretation, and that there might be some remaining ambiguity. I guess I have looked at 25 different formulations at this basic proposition in the last 2 years. Every one of them has some ambiguity in somebody's opinion. Frankly, I do not care about that. I will tell you why. Because, unlike the balanced budget amendment, the no-debt limit portion of the amendment is self-enforcing. Not only would the courts enforce it, but more important and more to the point, the bond markets will enforce it.

Any ambiguity which remains after the passage of this will be resolved in an inclusive way. In other words, if there is a doubt of whether or not Congress acted properly to authorize the issuance of more public debt, I will tell you right here and now what ever any Congressman or Senator says or what ever the Supreme Court says, the bond markets will see to it that the intent of this is faithfully adhered to.

So I congratulate the Senator from Utah, and I really do thank him for helping us to get over this hurdle.

Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in the committee I offered an amendment and then withdrew it with the idea that it would be worked out. I am glad that we are making some progress, and may have made sufficient progress.

However, there are some aspects of this I think the Senate ought to realize. You are changing the raising of the debt ceiling to a three-fifths vote. It means that from now on, since this is all debt ceiling as you would have it, in the future after the present debt ceiling would run you would not have debt if there was not an excess of outlays over receipts.

So what it in effect says is that after a certain period of time all future raising of the debt ceiling will have to be done by a three-fifths vote. And I am not sure that is a bad requirement. But I think you had better realize that.

The second aspect of this is the language of section 1 that this is added to requires only the action of three-fifths of both Houses of Congress. It does not involve the presentment to the President. It eliminates the President from the debt ceiling process, and of the raising of the debt ceiling.

I really think we ought to have the President involved in raising of the debt ceiling. I really think if you are going to have an unbalanced budget that the President ought to be involved in that. But according to the colloquy that we had yesterday, there is no question now that the presentment to the President under section 1 is eliminated.

I think we are adopting language from section 8 of the Constitution, article I, which talks about the credit of the United States. And I have not yet had an opportunity to thorougly research and go into this. I hope that there is no ambiguity on this as to the general obligation of the United States as opposed to revenue bonds.

Many States have interpreted their constitutions in a manner that revenue bonds do not involve the general obligation or the general credit of the State. I have not studied this. And I will do it. But I think this needs to be studied, and during this period of time, I would suggest staff and others work on this to be sure that the word "borrowing" on the credit of the United States is sufficiently broad to cover all aspects of borrowing—not just revenue sharing, not general obligation but all aspects of it.

I think that ought to be carefully looked into. I am a little bit worried from the language that was in the former Armstrong amendment in that there you made the public debt permanent. And you had a base to start from.

That language is not in it. And this language has just come about now in the last hour or two, and we have not had an opportunity to research it and study it. But before, there was a purpose in making the public debt permanent and tying therefore the raising of the public debt by the three-fifths vote that was required tying it to that permanency of the public debt.

Again, it may not be any problem on this but I do think that these matters need to be looked into. But there are some substantial changes that will occur. You will eventually have the situation of where you reach a debt limit, and after you reach the debt limit you will not have any increase in debt under a constitutional amendment like this unless outlays are in excess of receipts.

From then on it would mean that the raising of the debt ceiling would have to be done by a three-fifths vote of the whole Members, of the whole Membership of each House which means 61 votes here, and I have not figured out what the three-fifths or 60 percent of the whole Membership of the House would be.

It also in accordance with the colloquy and the language here eliminates the President from the debt ceiling process. And you do not have representation. I merely point these out to say that maybe in the meantime we ought to be carefully considering this. When we come back it may well be that technical amendments should be made relative to that matter.

So I at this time intend to support this amendment. I do not intend to call for any rollcall vote since the managers of the bill want to accept it, and since I am in general agreement with it.

But I do raise some concerns which I hope will be thoroughly studied in the interim between now and the time that we finally vote on Senate Joint Resolution 225, the constitutional amendment.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I want to join in thanking my colleague from Utah for working so hard on this amendment and also to commend my colleague from Colorado who first expressed the very serious concerns that we make certain that if we pass a budget-balancing amendment, that we will really get the job done. Many of us have had the experience of seeing the budget-balanced on paper year in and year out. We come up with estimates that indicate what our income is going to be, and, of course, we overestimate that always.

We come up with estimates of what our outlays will be and we always tend to underestimate the amount of outlays. So we have had balanced budgets on paper at the beginning of many years around here only to find out that by the time the year ends we are many billions of dollars in the red.

Many of us want to make sure we send to the people for ratification a proposed amendment to the U.S. Constitution that is really an effective one, that we make certain that we balance the actual outlays of this Government with the actual income of this Government.

I think that this amendment assures that this provision will be effective in that regard.

The adoption of this particular provision will assure that we cannot increase the debt of the United States without an action by a supermajority, and that means that we will have to balance the actual income and outlays of this Government on an annual basis. That is exactly what we should be striving to do.

I want to commend all of those who had a part in making certain that when we present this amendment to the people it will not be a mere slogan but it will be effective in doing exactly what it purports to do.

I would like to ask the Senator from Utah a question in regard to it.

There has been an issue raised or a question raised in regard to agricultural programs. We, of course, have many agricultural programs which involve the granting of loans to farmers on an individual basis. We have programs that operate through the CCC, the Commodity Credit Corporation, on a revolving fund basis. So there is, of course, a temporary extension of the creditor loans of the Government of the United States in the operation of these agricultural programs. But on a fiscal year basis, the operation of this particular program has never been deemed by itself to constitute an increase in the national debt limit or the total borrowing authority of the Government of the United States.

I would ask my colleague from Utah if I am correct in assuming that the kind of agricultural programs that I have described would not be constrained by the language of this amendment, that this amendment, instead, is dealing with the total borrowing of the U.S. Government on a fiscal year basis to assure that we are not adding to the national debt at the end of a fiscal year.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will yield, the Senator raises a very good point. The fact of the matter is the intent of this amendment is only with regard to financing, borrowing to finance the deficit. It would not affect the other matters that the distinguished Senator is concerned about, the CCC or the other agricultural matters that he is concerned about.

Mr. BOREN. As I understand, Mr. President, it merely says that the borrowing on the credit of the United States would not be authorized, any additions to the borrowing on the credit of the United States, without a special vote. That is the reason we added the words "to finance excessive outlays over receipts for any fiscal year." Is that correct, that it is our intent that it not apply to the agricultural programs?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Utah. Again, I commend him and my colleague from Colorado for their actions. I hope that if we pass an amendment to the Constitution to balance the budget, that it will get the job done. I know that people in the future will realize the debt of gratitude that they owe him and others who have participated in this process.

Mr. DECONCINI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, let me rise to express the appreciation of this Senator to the Senator from Oklahoma and particularly the Senator from Colorado. He has been very consistent in his beliefs. We worked 3 years ago on this particular financing issue and the three-fifths vote. I think a great deal of credit goes to him for being willing first to negotiate on it but credit goes to him for being willing first to negotiate on it but without giving up his underlying principle, that is, to raise the national debt you have to have a three-fifths vote. It is right on target and is what this country needs. It has made a very definite improvement in this amendment. I think it is going to be well received in this body and hopefully in the House and when it is referred to the people for ratification.

I also thank the Senator from Utah for being, as usual, willing to work out something that we did try to do in the Judiciary Committee without jeopardizing the simplicity that we tried to maintain in this bill and also incorporating a good, solid financial idea.

Mr. BUMPERS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, let me address two or three questions to the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Colorado.

I want to ask a couple of questions pursuant to the questions raised by the Senator from Oklahoma about farm programs.

For example, the Farmers Home Administration has two loan programs, a direct loan program and a guaranteed loan program. We score the direct loan program as an outlay; is that not correct?

Mr. HATCH. It applies only with regard to borrowing.

Mr. BUMPERS. I am sorry, I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. The language of this amendment applies to each fiscal year. It applies to financing excess of outlays over receipts. In other words, it applies to finance borrowing to raise the debt limit, if that is the only way it has to be. But it does not interfere with the programs the Senator is concerned about. I think we made that clear in our colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. BUMPERS. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator explain to us why that is the case? I have read the amendment. Why is it the case that on certain programs, loans would be made without any limitation or restriction, would not be affected by this provision?

Mr. HATCH. The language in this amendment is intended to clarify that this amendment does not extend borrowing within or during a fiscal year as long as no borrowing is necessary at year's end to reconcile outlays with receipts. In other words, it permits borrowing by the farm programs within or during any particular year. That language makes that very clear.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the CCC be covered.

Mr. HATCH. It will not be covered.

Mr. SARBANES. Not at all?

Mr. HATCH. Not at all. It would not be covered.

Mr. SARBANES. How about student loan programs?

Mr. HATCH. That would be the same principle.

Mr. SARBANES. The student loan programs would not be covered?

Mr. HATCH. That is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. So if a program can be set up on that basis, whatever the program may be, it would not be covered by this amendment?

Mr. HATCH. So long as it is within that fiscal year.

Mr. SARBANES. So that in any instance that we might want the program not to be subjected to this, it could be set up with factors comparable either to the agricultural loans or the student loans, is that correct?

Mr. HATCH. That is correct. You have to say that this amendment has to be read in the context of the whole constitutional amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 225. It does not forbid all borrowing of the Government. It only requires a supermajority for borrowing in any fiscal year required to fund in that fiscal year.

Mr. BUMPERS. Does the amendment go to Government borrowing or borrowing by others on the guarantee of Government?

Mr. HATCH. It goes to Government borrowing to finance.

Mr. SARBANES. Borrowing on the credit of the United States, does that apply simply to direct Government borrowing or any instance in which the credit of the United States may be available as a guarantee?

Mr. HATCH. It does say it shall authorize the Government to borrow.

Mr. SARBANES. But what is the answer to the question? As to the meaning of the phrase "borrowing on the credit of the United States"—does that extend only to direct Government borrowing, or does it encompass instances in which the credit of the United States is pledged or used as a guarantee for borrowers?

Mr. HATCH. Under those circumstances, it would cover both.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, let me walk through a couple of examples, if I may. Right now, we finance the deficit in a number of ways. One way, of course, is that we just print money. The chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank, Mr. Volcker, just prints a certain amount of money.

Another way we finance the deficit, of course, is through borrowing. We issue Government bonds and Treasury bills and so on. That is borrowing—I think the Senator and I would both agree there is absolutely no question that that is borrowing on the credit of the United States.

Mr. HATCH. This is correct.

Mr. BUMPERS. Now, the Senator's amendment obviously would say that under the terms of this amendment, the Treasury may not go out and just borrow money nor may Congress authorize borrowing. I assume the amendment says, in effect, that Congress may not authorize borrowing to pay for outlays in excess of receipts without a three-fifths vote. Is that a fair statement?

Mr. HATCH. That is correct. We cannot finance deficit——

Mr. BUMPERS. We agree on that. As far as I know, they cannot do that now without at least a majority vote by Congress.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct.

Mr. BUMPERS. The second question is the more relevant one because, right now, farmers all over America are going down to the banks and borrowing money and the Farmers Home Administration is guaranteeing those loans. The reason they are borrowing that money and the reason the banks are letting them have the money is that they are putting up the credit of the United States. I do not see any other interpretation that can be put on it: "Nor shall borrowing on the credit of the United States be authorized."

Certainly, a student who is getting a guaranteed student loan, a farmer who is getting a guaranteed farm loan, a small businessman who is getting a guaranteed Small Business Administration loan—nobody will lend any one of those people 10 cents except under the full faith and credit of the U.S. Government. Why does the Senator's amendment not apply to those?

Mr. HATCH. Let me make it clear, Mr. President, we are not covering loan guarantees unless they produce net debt.

Mr. BUMPERS. Well, the Senator is not talking about the language of the amendment.

Mr. HATCH. We are not talking about loan guarantees unless they produce a net debt. If they do, we are going to have to have a three-fifths vote to increase the net debt. Under the Constitution right now, loan guarantees do not——

Mr. BUMPERS. So the Senator is, regarding Farmers Home Loan and all these other loans, saying they will require a three-fifths vote.

Mr. DECONCINI. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. BUMPERS. I shall be happy to yield to anybody who can explain this.

Mr. DECONCINI. I do not know if I can explain it to the Senator's satisfaction, but as far as I understand it, if you have a student loan or a Farmers Home Loan, you do not have a debt. You have guaranteed the loan.

Mr. BUMPERS. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. DECONCINI. Let me finish, Mr. President.

Let us say there is a default on the loan and the banker now wants to collect. He is entitled to go to the Farmers Home Loan Bank or the CCC or the Student Loan Program and present it for a payment. The Treasury pays that. If there is no money in the Treasury because there are not enough receipts, then there is a debt that has to be financed. That debt, if you trace it all the way back to the Senator's hypothetical, is going to take three-fifths vote to finance.

But to guarantee the debt in the first place, in the first instance, will not require any such vote. If a default is there and there is no money to pay it and you have gone to the market, that is the public debt.

Mr. BUMPERS. I do not understand that answer, I must confess.

Mr. HATCH. Let me see if I can explain it to the Senator. In the case of the instance that the distinguished Senator from Arkansas raises, the individuals are borrowing under the guarantee of the United States. I think the distinguished Senator from Arizona is absolutely correct: If they default after having borrowed on that guarantee—they are not borrowing on the credit of the United States; they are borrowing on the guarantee of the United States. If they default, that becomes money that the United States owes. At that point, that would increase the net debt. If it increases the net debt beyond the receipts, then we are going to have to have a three-fifths vote. But only then.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, is the Senator telling me that the U.S. Congress can pass a law which allows these different categories of groups such as small business people, students, farmers—he is telling me that we can pass a bill by a simple majority vote here that will enable them to go down to the bank and borrow money on the guarantee, the full faith and credit of the United States, and he is telling me that if they default and we have to pay that off, that is going to require a three-fifths vote of this body?

Mr. HATCH. No, Mr. President, Farmers Home loans, CCC loans, guaranteed student loans are not covered by this at all because they are borrowed on the guarantee of the United States. But if they default and they contribute to the overall public debt under the budget of our country, then we are going to have to have a three-fifths vote.

Mr. SIMON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. On those particular defaults.

Mr. GRAMM. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator from Utah yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, let me clarify this as I understand it. Let me remind the distinguished Senator from Arkansas that we have a statutory debt limit. That debt limit, the last I looked, was $2.3 trillion. We have an outstanding contingency liability on loan guarantees, on commitments to Federal retirement, and Social Security, many times that amount. But they do not represent the debt of the Federal Government.

As I understand the answer that has been given in relation to this amendment, it is simple and straightforward:

No. 1, this amendment does not affect debt transactions of the Government within the fiscal year so long as the debt ceiling for that fiscal year is not increased.

No. 2, it does not affect the guaranteed lending of the Federal Government or the Government's debt transactions as long as it does not entail a claim against the Federal Government where the Federal Government must incur a deficit or must incur debt. That is the amendment as I understand it.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator from Texas yield on that point?

Mr. GRAMM. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. As I understand the presentation that was made on this amendment, an argument for it was that it would embrace the constitutional language to borrow money on the credit of the United States. Is that correct?

Mr. GRAMM. I am sorry, Mr. President, but I was not here when that argument was made.

Mr. SARBANES. Well, that was an argument advanced by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG], that the language contained here tracked the constitutional language. I note that in fact, it does do that: "to borrow money on the credit of the United States."

As I understand it, we are being told that when the Government guarantees these loans that are made, that is not embraced within this language of borrowing on the credit of the United States.

Mr. DECONCINI. If the Senator will yield, Mr. President——

Mr. SARBANES. If that is correct, where is the power coming from to make those guarantees? What constitutional language provides the power to make the guarantees if it is not the constitutional language to borrow money on the credit of the United States? Either the guarantee is encompassed within the language or the Senator must show me other constitutional language that provides the guarantee authority.

Mr. DECONCINI. If the Senator will yield—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. GRAMM. I shall be happy to yield, but let me respond very briefly.

This amendment is an enforcing mechanism on the requirement to balance the budget. It says that if we borrow money by raising, in this case, the debt ceiling to allow the borrowing of money by the Federal Government, it will require a three-fifths vote.

The guaranteeing of credit involves borrowing money only if the loans are not paid, and the contingency liability falls back on the Federal Government.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAMM. I will be happy to yield in just a moment. But in terms of the guaranteed student loan, if that guaranteed student loan were within a balanced budget, then that loan can operate. If default results beyond the limits set out, and requires the Federal Government to incur debt, and we were in a situation where the net debt had to be increased, it would take a three-fifths vote.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. Let me just say to the Senator from Maryland, I understand what the point is, I think, but I think there is one missed interpretation here. Today—and the Senator from Arkansas raised it—when you have these guaranteed loans, whether they are in the agriculture area or student loans, that does not go as part of the public debt. And we do not have to have a vote.

Mr. BUMPERS, Wait a minute.

Mr. DECONCINI. And that does not have to have a vote.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator will yield, this does not say the public debt. I think the Senator from Texas——

Mr. DECONCINI. It says the full faith and credit of the United States.

Mr. SARBANES [continuing]. Left open the circle. Where the circle is left open is the assertion that has been made to us by the manager of the bill in response to questions that this language does not cover farm loans or student loans.

Mr. DECONCINI. Guarantees.

Mr. SARBANES. Where is the authority for the guarantee coming from if it is not coming from the language "borrowing on the credit of the United States?" You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. BUMPERS. Let me ask a simple question of the Senator from Arizona.

Whose credit is being used when that farmer goes into the bank to get a guaranteed loan, guaranteed by the U.S. Government, or a student or a small businessman that is going in to get a guaranteed loan guaranteed by the U.S. Government? Whose credit is being used to get that money?

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator from Arkansas knows that when you go in and you borrow money, if he goes in and borrows money, the institution is loaning to him. Now, if I guarantee it, and they say they will not loan it to the Senator from Arkansas unless the Senator from Arizona guarantees it, that is a second transaction to insure it. In case the Senator from Arkansas does not pay it, they have somebody who will. That is the same thing with a guaranteed loan. If there is a default first by the Senator who borrowed it, or the farmer, or the student, then you come to the person who guaranteed it.

Mr. BUMPERS. At that point, how many votes is it going to take? Because that was not contemplated. And when that man defaults on the loan, the U.S. Government is going to have to pay it off.

Mr. DECONCINI. That is right. If that happens and the Government writes the check to pay the loan off, it comes out of the Treasury. If there is no money in the Treasury, as the Senator from Texas pointed out, to get the money to pay that off, because it is more than what the receipts are coming in, you would have to have a three-fifths vote.

Mr. BUMPERS. All right. Now, a second question. How many banks do you know, once you explain that just the way the Senator explained it to me just now, how many banks do you know are going to loan somebody money when it says now, wait just a minute here, Mr. Jones. I am looking at this amendment that the Senate adopted there on March 12 at about 7:30 in the evening without really thinking much about it. You adopted this amendment. I want to go over it with you. Now, what they said during the debate on that is if you default on this thing, it may require a three-fifths vote for me to ever get my money. What if the Senate is responding to a public clamor not to exceed receipts under any conditions? How am I going to get my money?

Mr. DECONCINI. As I just explained to the Senator, he asked how many banks——

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator asked how many banks.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. Just as many banks are involved now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DECONCINI. Who has the floor?

Mr. BUMPERS. Who has the floor?

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, who has the floor?

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor, and he yielded for a question. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, perhaps it would be easiest for me to respond.

Let me respond to the Senator from Arkansas that each bank, each creditor every day faces exactly that dilemma.

Mr. BUMPERS. A three-fifths vote?

Mr. GRAMM. In fact, when we went a week without raising the debt ceiling, the contingency liability of the Federal guarantee of every credit extended where the Government was a contingency liability holder was called into question. We have exactly the same situation existing today. If Congress had to raise the debt ceiling to pay off that loan, then the loan would be paid only if Congress voted to raise the debt ceiling. All that this would require is that there be a three-fifths vote.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is recognized.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is recognized.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, who has the floor?

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I was seeking recognition.

Mr. MELCHER. I am seeking recognition, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. I object, Mr. President. The Senator cannot yield the floor.

Mr. GRAMM. I answered a question because he was asking a question.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I renew my request to find out whether the Senator from Texas will yield for a question.

Mr. GRAMM. I have yielded to the Senator from Utah for a question.

Mr. MELCHER. From Utah?

Mr. HATCH. May I yield to the distinguished Senator from Montana. I want to make a request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will take unanimous consent.

Mr. MELCHER. I am sorry this amendment came up.

Mr. HATCH. Without losing my right to the floor, I would be happy to yield for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

The Senator from Texas can only yield for a question.

Mr. GRAMM. I would be happy to yield to the Senator from Montana for a question.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senator.

Now, I am sorry this amendment came up. I support the underlying amendment, the constitutional amendment. I am sorry this one has been offered. And I am asking now, since it has been stated incorrectly—or maybe not incorrectly, because it is hard to tell from these answers given—that this does not affect the CCC borrowing, might I ask the Senator from Texas if that is correct, if that is his interpretation of this language, it does not affect CCC borrowing?

Mr. GRAMM. It affects the CCC borrowing only to the extent that it adds to the deficit and therefore entails an increase in the debt limit on the debt of the United States.

Mr. MELCHER. Well, there may have been some confusion here because when you are talking about loan guarantees and farm loans, a crop loan is not a guaranteed loan. It is a nonrecourse loan. And whatever billions of dollars it adds up to in this fiscal year and the next fiscal year, we call for that loan to be available.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield to me? I would be happy to answer his question.

Mr. GRAMM. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Let me at least try to answer the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas can yield for a question.

Mr. GRAMM. Well, if I may try——

Mr. HATCH. Yield to me and I will ask my question to the Senator, but I am also answering him in the process.

Mr. GRAMM. I yield to the Senator from Utah for a somewhat convoluted question.

Mr. HATCH. I think that is a very nice thing to do.

Let me just say this: This amendment does not cover FHA, CCC, or other loans at all. If those loans are defaulted, the default becomes an outlay. Under our budget, it beomes an outlay. And that added outlay is treated as all other outlays are treated at that point.

Mr. MELCHER. I want to stop my friend.

Mr. HATCH. Let me just finish.

Mr. MELCHER. It is not treated the same. It is treated as an obligation against the United States and the whole budget process.

Mr. HATCH. That is right. That is right. That is right.

Mr. HATCH. I agree with that.

Mr. MELCHER. So it is different than a guaranteed loan.

Mr. HATCH. There is no question about it. That is the distinction I am drawing.

Mr. MELCHER. OK.

Mr. HATCH. Only if outlays exeed receipts will we have a deficit. If it is treated as an outlay, which, of course, it will be at that point upon default, then only if outlays exceed receipts will we have a deficit. Then the Treasury could not borrow to cover the deficit without a three-fifths vote.

Now, this amendment only affects borrowing to finance deficits, not borrowing for FHA or other purposes.

Now, this clause defining the purpose of our amendment here is clear, Guaranteed loans are not included in the amendment. The amendment addresses only one narrow class of borrowing, and that is borrowing to finance a deficit. And that does not arise until it becomes defaulted or becomes in the form of an outlay so that it is included within the deficit. Other borrowing is untouched by this amendment. And the language is explicit and our intent is explicit.

Mr. MELCHER. Well, the correct answer, if I can interpret the response of the Senator from Utah, is that CCC borrowing would become subject to this at the point it exeeds the planned outlay for that fiscal year?

Mr. HATCH. No; that is not true. Only if the CCC borrowing is defaulted by individual defaulters. Then it becomes an outlay because the Federal Government becomes obligated for it at that point.

Mr. MELCHER. Let us review it.

CCC borrowing is done periodically, whenever the CCC runs out of funds. It has been routine since I have been in Congress for CCC appropriations almost automatically to be reauthorized. We passed one a few days ago for a little over $5 billion.

I think the correct answer, as I understand the Senator from Utah, is that at the point that CCC borrowing would exceed the planned outlay for that given year—I am talking about replenishing the fund, appropriating dollars to CCC whenever they need it—if they did exceed it, the budget for that year would put the budget over, in the red, and then it would require a 16 percent loan.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct.

The amendment says: "Nor shall borrowing on the credit of the United States be authorized to finance any excess of outlays over receipts."

We are specific about that. What we are saying here is that the amendment addresses only one, narrow class of borrowing, and that is borrowing to finance the actual deficit. It does not affect these other programs, because they do not become outlays until there is a default. It is that simple.

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator does have the floor?

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I have to take the chair, so let me make my statement.

I have delayed coming to the floor to speak on the balanced budget amendment to this point because I was concerned about enforceability. I want to be sure that when we respond to a public mandate that I perceive to be very real and very strong, and when we go back home and say that we adopted an amendment to the Constitution to mandate a balanced budget, something all the American people want very strongly, that in fact we have done that in such a way as to bind Congress and to close a loophole in the Constitution that Jefferson recognized when he said that a mistake we have made in the Constitution is not limiting the ability of the Federal Government to borrow money. This amendment closes that loophole very specifically.

I decided to come forward now and endorse the amendment very strongly because I believe that, No. 1, we have closed a potential loophole in terms of off-budget items by limiting the ability of the Federal Government to incur debt without a three-fifths vote. I believe we have an effective enforcement mechanism.

As the distinguished Senator from Utah said, if there is any doubt about the full faith and credit of the United States on these bonds, they will not sell.

I believe that we have now a clearcut amendment which is workable and enforceable and does what we claim it will do.

Many people have said, "Well, now that we have the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amendment, do we need a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution?" I believe we do. Our bill is an emergency bill. It runs for only 5 years, and at the end of 5 years it will be gone. What we are trying to do in that bill is balance the budget. What we are trying to do in this amendment to the Constitution is to keep it balanced.

The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill is to the balanced budget amendment to the Constitution what engagement is to marriage. I believe we have an opportunity here to consumate that marriage. It may not be a marriage of love, but it is a marriage of necessity.

I believe that the American people want this amendment. I strongly support it. I am totally satisfied with the amendment, and I urge my colleagues to accept this amendment.

Let us be sure that when we adopt a balanced budget to the Constitution it is in fact binding on Congress. I believe the net result will be a stronger and richer America.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on page 52 of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the balanced budget constitutional amendment, there is this paragraph:

> Loans for which the Federal Government guarantees in whole or in part the repayment of principal and/or interest impose no funding obligation on the Treasury unless and until such loans come into default and the Treasury must discharge and guarantee obligation. Such a discharge is intended to be construed as an outlay in the fiscal year of discharge, not in the fiscal year during which the loan was guaranteed. Such a discharge is not intended to be construed as a repayment of debt principal; unlike the debt repayments to be excluded, such discharges do not involve a prior receipt by the Treasury of borrowed funds.

That language, I think, would have clearly explained this, prior to the adoption of the amendment that has total receipts and total outlays. I believe that the adoption of this language of "total" has meant that all outlays and all receipts are now covered under this. I think that, therefore, this thing has to be studied. You had a report that was studied. You had definitions, a lot of definitions, in this about outlays.

I cannot find the one dealing with CCC, but I say to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] that there is in this a particular about revolving funds.

Maybe it still could be covered, but we have to clarify this issue, where you have the managers of this bill saying they are not going to take any amendments and started taking amendments; and without really giving a lot of serious thought to it, we now have put the report in a situation where it may not be applicable. I think it is important that we study this to see its effect before we go into the final adoption of this.

I think that a week off is a good idea to do some careful studying, careful review of the report we have, in order to determine what the language may be and what the interpretation may be. I believe some good questions have been raised.

What I was saying is directed toward the word "total." It is not directed toward the credit obligation amendment. In the Armstrong-Boren amendment that was adopted some 3 years ago, the credit obligation of the United States was not involved, and it was directed merely to the public debt.

I have raised some questions about that language. The language, of course, is adopted from the original Constitution, in section 8 of article I, which gives a precedent. In looking, we found that there have been very few cases that have interpreted that particular clause of the Constitution. I do not think it sheds much light on it, and I raise the question whether you have something like revenue bonds or credit that goes toward specific trust funds and other things that might be involved here.

So I think that this needs to be carefully studied.

The report language would have really answered all of the questions that have been raised, but with the amendments that have been now accepted, it raises a serious question about them. I think all of this should be carefully studied before we finally adopt the constitutional amendment to balance the budget.

Mr. MELCHER and Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMM). The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, as I said earlier, I am sorry that this amendment has been proposed because there is some fear in my heart that it might be accepted.

I listened to what I could on the radio before coming over here on how this amendment would affect Commodity Credit Corporation, and I did not hear anything said about it.

Then when I walked on to the floor, we were talking about loan guarantees and somehow the Commodity Credit Corporation got mixed up with loan guarantees.

The nonrecourse loans that CCC makes on crops are certainly treated differently and budgetwise than loan guarantees are.

As I understand the answer I received from the Senator from Utah, CCC, it is intended, would only be restricted when it had exceeded its loaning capability and was necessary for an appropriation to be made to overcome that.

The nature of the Commodity Credit Corporation funding is such that we do not know from March of this year until August of this year exactly how much will be necessary. We will not know come September 30 if we will have to appropriate more funds for CCC before we adjourn until the very end of a period Congress is going to be in session and then, if it appears that we may need to, we will have an appropriation bill out of the House appropriating funds for CCC.

I do not know whether there are other examples of the Commodity Credit Corporation in the U.S. Government functions. There may be, but I will speak only to this one. A super majority is 60 percent of those voting, three-fifths, 60 percent of the whole number of both Houses of Congress. My fear is that, given the nature of Congress appropriations to fund CCC activities which come up periodically, perhaps twice a year some years, maybe three times a year occasionally, surely once in a year at least for the past 8 or 9 years, at least once a year requiring a supermajority will be difficult to obtain.

We cannot predict what the needs are. We just have to meet those needs when they occur, and they occur at a very unlikely time and a very untimely occasion when it would be extremely difficult to receive 60 percent of the entire body of each House of Congress.

Now, I have a further question in my mind at least, of whether or not in the language itself, or in the very detailed report, this matter has ever been seriously considered. I am comfortable with the other terms in the proposed constitutional amendment requiring that there be a majority of the entire House and the entire Senate to increase revenue. I am not uncomfortable with that. It is a little bit different than what we have now.

I am not uncomfortable with the section 1 as it stands before us without this amendment, that we have to agree in a budgetary process that we are going to have 60 percent vote, 60 percent of the whole number of both Houses.

But I am very uncomfortable with this amendment. I am not sure how it covers even the term "nonrecourse loan," how that is counted, whether CCC can be examined to determine, since it is a revolving fund, that it is really out of money before we have an appropriation.

I see with the dire circumstances we have been in with agricultural programs that funding for CCC is much higher than we would like and that there is certainly a growing attitude that perhaps we are appropriating too much for these agricultural programs.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MELCHER. That being the case, I find it difficult in my own mind to think that come an emergency we are going to have the supermajority to get the necessary work done.

Yes, I am delighted to yield to my friend from Utah.

(Mr. ARMSTRONG assumed the chair.)

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will yield, maybe I can shed light on this. There is no question that the guaranteed loans are not included in this amendment. The amendment addresses, as I said before, just one narrow class of borrowing, that is borrowing to finance the deficit.

So CCC loans, FHA loans, other guaranteed loans are not part of this.

We make it clear in the report on this issue. Loans for which the Federal Government guarantees in whole or in part the repayment of principal or interest impose no funding obligations on the Treasury unless and until such loans come into default and the Treasury must discharge a guarantee obligation.

Such discharge is intended to be construed as an outlay in the fiscal year of discharge, not in the fiscal year in which the loan was guaranteed. Such a discharge is not intended to be construed as a repayment of debt principal. Unlike the debt repayments to be included, such discharges do not involve a prior receipt by the Treasury of borrowed funds.

Furthermore, this amendment, should it be passed by both Houses of Congress, really does not become effective until fiscal year 1991 or the second fiscal year beginning after its ratification, whichever is later.

Assuming that is the case and assuming Gramm-Rudman works at all, and let us assume it becomes effective in fiscal year 1991, we should have a balanced budget in that year. Whether we do or not, it just means that we have to look at the whole budget and with regard to all appropriations bills we have to make priority choices.

I have no doubt in my mind that those priority choices will be made before any debt ceiling problem comes into mind, even if the Senator was right that we have to have appropriations for CCC or FHA or whatever else it may be.

The fact is that I cannot imagine this body not funding those entities as a priority funding preference over some of the other things that we continually fund that are not priority to those. Even if we do not do that, then there are lots of alternatives under this amendment as to what could be done even assuming that there are some literal outlays as a result of appropriations bills with regard to some of the areas the Senator is concerned with, and I do not think there will be because they are guarantees, they are not outlays.

Now even if there were, then we have the option of getting three-fifths vote, we can increase taxes by a majority vote, we can provide for sinking funds to take care of these matters. Frankly, there is no real problem with this particular issue.

It is clear. I think the language is clear. I think this is an important amendment because of what it does. It says "Look, the games are over on these debt ceiling liftoffs because we just do those by voice votes half the time anymore." Frankly, that is one of the big problems we have.

If we are serious about the balanced budget amendment, it seems to me we have to have the language in it.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I have to clarify one additional point.

Mr. MELCHER. I am delighted to yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. The Senator's concern, as I understand it, is that if you had some defaults under CCC above the level you are holding contingencies for, that under this amendment to the balanced budget amendment you would be required to get a three-fifths vote. I understand that concern, but let me assure the Senator that that concern exists with or without this amendment. This is because, if the contingency fund being held to redeem the CCC loans is insufficient to meet the demand, that is going to produce a deficit and that is going to require a three-fifths vote, as well.

So the concern that the Senator raises is not a concern that is produced by this amendment, which controls the incurring of debt, because if defaults on CCC were above the level that we were carrying in the budget, those defaults would produce a deficit and would require a three-fifths vote with or without this amendment. And I think that is an important point to clarify.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I thank both the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Texas. I am going to restate my concerns.

First of all, we are not dealing with guaranteed loans. CCC nonrecourse loans on crops are simply not guaranteed loans. They are a little bit of a different breed, maybe you would like to call them a hybrid. They are nonrecourse loans.

My concerns are as follows: One is that in accounting procedures there may be a question of whether CCC actually has more nonrecourse loans in its portfolio than exceeds its borrowing authority. Now, that is one point. That can happen. I suspect, if you talk to the CCC people downtown, they will assure you that it has happened occasionally, perhaps rarely, and perhaps in very insignificant amounts.

But, nevertheless, this language would cover that and would require this supermajority in order to provide an appropriation if it would exceed expected outlays for any given year; that is, the expected total outlay for any given year.

I do not believe that the committee report has dealt with this specific problem. It is just the repayment of debt principal, receipts, borrowing outlays, total outlays, guaranteed loans, what have you. They simply do not cover that.

A nonrecourse loan is just the option of the individual farmer, whether he wants to redeem and claim his crop or not. It is not really a default. He just makes that decision. And what the CCC can do about that is nothing after the crop is underground.

Second, the way the crop loans are made has nothing to do with fiscal years. They happen to fall on one side or the other of the fiscal year. The corn loan may be made in the beginning of a fiscal year, whereas a wheat loan may have been made toward the tail end of the previous fiscal year.

I am not trying to raise questions that cannot be answered in this debate. What I am trying to point out is that we have not really addressed that, as far as I know, in the committee report, nor has it adequately been covered in this discussion we have had.

The nonrecourse loan is a different type of animal. The Commodity Credit Corporation itself is a different type of Government function. If there are other types similar to it in the U.S. Government, I do not know of them, but there may be.

I am very regretful that the amendment is being offered, because I think it raises some serious questions. I hope that the amendment is either withdrawn or defeated.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I move the amendment.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAMM). The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, we have had a request for a rollcall vote with regard to the amendment. I suggest that we temporarily lay aside the Armstrong amendment so that we can confer with the majority leader as to when that rollcall will take place.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we temporarily lay aside that amendment to give us time to chat with the majority leader to determine when that rollcall vote will occur—either tonight or tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana reserves the right to object.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, can we not make up our mind either to vote now or vote tomorrow?

Mr. HATCH. Let me amend the unanimous-consent request.

I ask unanimous consent that we temporarily lay aside the Armstrong amendment until 8:15, whereupon a rollcall vote will take place. The majority leader would like the rollcall vote this evening.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I object. If I understand what the Senator is asking, he is asking that we wait around until 8:15, and then we decide that we are going to have a rollcall vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, if we want to put this off until tomorrow, we can ask for that request now.

We should not have to wait around to accommodate people who are out on the town, which is OK if they want to go out on the town. But the rest of us should not have to wait around.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will yield, there are Senators who have gone home who felt there were going to be no further rollcall votes this evening. They are not out on the town. We want to allow them time to come back. We could start the vote now, and have a lengthy vote to allow them time to come in.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. Surely.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Would it not be advisable at this point to get unanimous consent with respect to, A, having this vote now, and going forward with it, continuing as long as the Senator from Utah or the Senator from South Carolina wanted to do it, then setting that matter aside temporarily—I will wait until the Senator can listen.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, might we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I yield for a question from the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I will start over since I know the Senator from Utah was preoccupied.

Would it not be possible to temporarily set this aside in order that we may dispose of the amendment that was defeated yesterday, and I know the Senator is prepared to accept it today, and immediately thereafter call up this amendment for a vote with the understanding that we will carry on the vote as long as the leadership desires it should be carried on but meanwhile those of us who are here could vote on it?

Mr. HATCH. I think that is a reasonable request.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Just a moment. And at the same time the Senator offer his unanimous-consent request so that we might dispose of that having to do with the final vote on March 25?

Mr. HATCH. Let me see if I can propound a unanimous-consent request that will be acceptable to my colleagues.

I ask unanimous consent that we temporarily lay aside the Armstrong amendment so that the distinguished Senator from Ohio can bring up his amendment, which I believe will be readily accepted here on the floor, and then immediately thereafter have a rollcall vote on the Armstrong amendment to extend as long as the majority leader desires; and then immediately afterwards, move to third reading, and then agree to have the final vote up and down on the balanced budget amendment, as amended, on March 25, of this month.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Without further amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Without further amendment, and at 4 o'clock p.m.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator will yield, we will go to third reading on that language in there. I will have to object to that. I want there to be some study to be done to correct some of the errors that have crept into this matter. I do not want to be precluded from having some technical amendments. I do not have any substantive amendments. But I think we are going to have to have the right to have some corrective amendments if the Armstrong amendment passes. But I cannot agree to go to third reading and preclude us from having the right to have technical amendments.

Mr. HATCH. I will so amend the unanimous-consent agreement to include the right to have technical amendments, but not substantive amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. EVANS. Reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I think it is terribly important now to identify what constitutes technical amendments. That may be subject to more misinterpretation than all of the rest of this.

Mr. HATCH. It would be by unanimous consent. That is how technical amendments are accepted.

Mr. EVANS. That is part of it; as a technical amendment. I think if it is indeed a technical amendment, it ought to be subjected to a unanimous-consent agreement. If that is the case, I have no objection. Otherwise, I do have an objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would have to object to that. I would like to keep the floor open to correct the thing dealing with the Constitution, and as a result of that I would like to be accommodating to the people and would like to be agreeable with them. But, nevertheless, I think I have to have the right to make what I would call technical amendments.

Mr. EVANS. If the Senator from Alabama will yield for a question, and I am not sure who has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. HATCH. I am happy to yield for a question.

Mr. EVANS. As the Senator put it, the Senator would reserve the right for what the Senator would call a technical amendment; that is, the Senator from Alabama would call a technical amendment, and would he describe further what he would place in that category, and what is outside that category?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have raised the debate of several issues pertaining to them. I do not know whether I can have a comprehensive list. In my judgment, there are quite a number.

I will attempt to name some in regard to this matter. It may well be that it will be technical to the extent of calling for some definitions.

We now have new terms that we are using which are contrary, and are different from the terms that were in the committee report language. As a result of this, it could have a considerable effect upon the application of this constitutional amendment.

I have raised some issues about the language in the Armstrong amendment as to whether or not the language "credit" of the United States includes general obligations, whether on the other hand they would take care of obligations of debt which involve matters of specific designation of certain revenues which are not general obligations.

There have been in the States a number of decisions relative to general obligation credit obligations that are entirely different from the general obligations. I think some of these need to be clarified.

It may well be that some technical amendment to accomplish the Armstrong amendment could well be to change the language from the credit of the United States or borrowing on the credit of the United States to the matter of limiting it to the public debt.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Let me see if I can accommodate my colleagues who would like to go home.

Let me just ask this much in a unanimous-consent request and we will proceed accordingly.

I ask unanimous consent that we temporarily set aside the Armstrong amendment to enable the distinguished Senator from Ohio to send his amendment to the desk, which we will accept, which we will dispose of. Immediately thereafter, for as long as the majority leader would like, we could have a rollcall vote on the Armstrong amendment. Let us go from there.

Mr. BYRD. Will the distinguished Senator propound the request?

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent to temporarily set aside the Armstrong amendment until the Metzenbaum amendment is adopted and then immediately go to a rollcall vote on the Armstrong amendment, to extend as long as the majority leader desires, to accommodate various Members of the Senate who may have to come from some distance.

Then when that is over we will proceed and try to resolve this. That will be to accommodate our colleagues. We will try to resolve whatever we can with regard to third reading and final disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I only want to state with regard to the Armstrong amendment that there is a very serious question that cannot be adequately addressed by the comments that have been made in the debate to the satisfaction of myself and perhaps of others, that it would not be very workable for CCC, the Commodity Credit Corporation, funding to continue in the same process that it has.

I only make these comments at this time because I shall not object to the request of the Senator from Utah. But the request does preclude further debate on the Armstrong amendment and I make those comments. I hope the Armstrong amendment is defeated because it raises questions that have not been totally answered as of yet and would probably complicate this constitutional amendment, and might be the very factor where it would not get the 67 votes that are needed to be accepted by the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. One more thing in the unanimous-consent request. I want to accommodate in that request both the majority leader and minority leader with regard to the length of the rollcall vote. They both should be satisfied with regard to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, as I understand the unanimous-consent request, it does preclude further debate on the Armstrong amendment.

Mr. HATCH. It does.

Mr. LEVIN. That is somewhat different from what I believe Senator MELCHER's understanding was.

Mr. HATCH. We would proceed to a rollcall vote on the Armstrong amendment.

Mr. LEVIN. I thought Senator MELCHER said he thought he would be able to debate the Armstrong amendment pursuant to that request.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend from Michigan, but I understand the unanimous-consent request would preclude further debate on the Armstrong amendment. While I am against the Armstrong amendment, I am willing to accede to the request.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, as I understand the unanimous-consent request, it would not preclude further amendment after the disposition of the Armstrong amendment.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct.

Mr. LEVIN. Would the Senator be willing to amend the unanimous-consent request to make it in order that the Armstrong amendment be amendable after it is adopted, if it is adopted?

Mr. HATCH. I cannot make that part of the request.

Mr. LEVIN. It would not be in order to amend the amendment after adoption unless it is part of the unanimous-consent request to allow us to do so. Would you be willing to amend your request?

Mr. HATCH. Yes; I so amend the unanimous-consent request in the event it is adopted.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the distinguished Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. To accommodate several of us who would like to go early, and there might be others, we ought to have a time limit. The Senator said as long as the majority and minority leaders want the rollcall vote to last. I would like to be back here and participate in any proceedings at a certain time and would like to eat in the meantime. I wonder if we could set a definite hour as being a minimum time. It would appear to me that if you are going to have to bring them in from all over the city, from Potomac and a few other places, you might well need a little time to get them here, since, as I understand it, they were told that there would not be any further votes. I would think a minimum of an hour would be required, or it might have to be longer than that.

When we come back, if we proceed then, I would want to be here at that time. Maybe we can agree on a certain time when we start voting that it would take at least an hour. Is that agreeable?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not particularly like the idea of the responsibility for the length of time resting on the majority and minority leaders at this hour of the evening. I can easily perceive of our being pressed to keep the vote open for another 30 minutes, another 45 minutes, another hour. I do not think we ought to do that. I have no objection to setting the pending amendment aside temporarily.

Mr. THURMOND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Could we make it not beyond 8:40? Would that be satisfactory?

Mr. METZENBAUM. If the Senator will yield, is there any reason why the Senator wants to have a vote this evening and not tomorrow morning?

Mr. THURMOND. The majority leader is here now. Perhaps he has a comment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRIBLE). The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. BYRD. May I say to the distinguished majority leader, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. If we are going to postpone any vote, it should be postponed until tomorrow. A good many Senators have gone with the understanding that there would be no more votes this evening. I do not mean that with respect to committee funding because I do not think they were told or had any right to infer that there would be no rollcall votes at all. But on this matter here, I should think, if the distinguished majority leader is agreeable, it really ought to go over until tomorrow.

There are some who are waiting patiently here. If we can go to the funding for the committees, that could be disposed of.

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. As relates to committee funding, I was led to believe that that probably would not come up tonight, and I allowed my staff to go home. I am perfectly ready if the Senator wants to bring it up tonight and vote on it, have the amendments and lay them over until tomorrow. I am here and ready to do whatever pleases my colleagues. I think we are getting into—if the people could see us tonight rather than just hear us tonight, they would understand basically some of the problems that occur after dinner.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I do not think anything unusual happens after dinner any more than would happen before dinner. I have no problem if we could go ahead and close off other amendments—in other words, agree that—I think one other amendment is going to be accepted. Is that correct?

Mr. THURMOND. That is correct, a Metzenbaum amendment.

Mr. DOLE. I must say when I indicated it looked pretty good for tonight, there was no doubt in my mind that the two amendments were going to be accepted and we were going to agree on a passage vote on March 25, we would go to the funding resolutions and any votes would be put over until tomorrow. That is when I thought we would be finished this by 6:30. Now it is 8 o'clock. I know Members on both sides have probably assumed, well, it is 8 o'clock and nothing has happened and they may not be on the way back.

Could we agree that the vote on this amendment would occur at, say, 10 o'clock tomorrow morning?

Mr. GARN. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I also remind the majority leader that a majority of the Senate stayed until 8 o'clock for nothing.

Mr. DOLE. I take issue with that, Mr. President. We would not have had any vote from 6 to 8 in any event because there are eight Republicans who could not be here. So let the RECORD reflect that there was no intention of having a vote between 6 and 8 because a Member on this side requested there not be any votes between 6 and 8. The distinguished minority leader knows that from time to time we need to protect our colleagues.

Mr. LEVIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, let me suggest, if we are going to delay the vote until tomorrow, that an amendment to this amendment be in order prior to the vote. The understanding of the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH]—I do not see him at the moment. He agreed it would be in order to offer an amendment to the Armstrong amendment, in the event it passed, after it passed in order to accommodate a vote tonight. It is a rather unusual procedure but if we are going to delay the vote on the Armstrong amendment until tomorrow, I would like the right to offer an amendment to that tomorrow. It would be with regard to the full faith and credit of the United States being protected on the loan guarantees and the nonrecourse loans. There is some concern about protecting the full faith and credit. If we are going to adopt the Armstrong amendment, I would like to offer an amendment prior to its being voted on tomorrow morning.

Mr. DOLE. Could the Senator offer it now?

Mr. LEVIN. I could send it to the desk now so everybody could see it.

Mr. DOLE. What I do not want to do is end up here tomorrow morning——

Mr. LEVIN. We could have a debate on it, 20 minutes evenly divided tomorrow morning would be fine, because this issue has been much debated tonight.

Mr. DOLE. Is there another amendment we are prepared to accept this evening?

Mr. SIMON. Senator METZENBAUM's amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Could we agree there be no other amendments?

Mr. HEFLIN. No, Mr. President, I have not agreed there be no other amendments. I want to reserve the right for technical amendments that can correct. I have no substantive amendment whatsoever, but there has been certain language that has been taken out, added, that changes entirely the definitions that were contained in the committee report. We are dealing with the Constitution.

I, of course, reserve the right as the language of the Armstrong amendment just came out. I have no desire to do anything other than technical, but that is my duty. Senator EVANS has questions about what is technical, but they would be very germane to what we have already done and would be there.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Is the Senator from Alabama willing to agree that the Parliamentarian could decide what is and is not technical?

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, I do not know all the problems. Here we are——

Mr. METZENBAUM. The answer is no, I guess.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have to study these things.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if we are going to do all this, I do not see any reason to leave the scene. I think we can notify Members and they could be here within the next hour. I see the makings of another full day on this matter, which I thought would have been resolved by 6:30 tonight. Had we voted passage at 6:30 tonight, the Senator from Alabama could raise technical amendments—I think he probably could always raise technical amendments. But it was my hope we could complete action on this tonight.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, Mr. President, I yield.

Mr. LONG. How were we going to vote by 6:30 when the leader told everybody we were not going to vote between 6 and 8? How were we going to vote at 6:30 if some Senators on the other side of the aisle were told there would be no votes between 6 and 8? I do not think a constitutional amendment is going to pass by a voice vote.

Mr. DOLE. It was the understanding that vote would come on March 25 at 2 o'clock—4 o'clock. There was not any effort to protect people on this side, but there was not any need not to protect them in this case because we were not going to vote in any event. Now we have people who want to amend the amendment and maybe people who have other amendments. What is the pleasure of the managers of the bill?

Mr. THURMOND. Either we could go ahead now or carry it over until tomorrow with one amendment.

Mr. SIMON. On this one, let us carry it over until tomorrow.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if we are going to delay it until March 25, then I would say that during that period of time, you have an opportunity to study it, to reflect on it, to read the case law on issues of the language to see what has been interpreted. None of this has ever been studied before, so I think it provides an opportunity. If we go on and vote now, then, of course, it can be straightened out in conference or someplace else. But if we are going to pass it over until the 25th, I think it provides an opportunity for some careful study. If we have careful study, I just want to reserve the right to be able to give you the fruits of the careful study.

Mr. DOLE. I do not know whether they may be ripe already. In any event, it seems to me we are still going to be in conference. The Senate is talking about vote tonight, go to conference or vote the 25th. We still end up in conference where we obviously add just technical amendments.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, will the leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. DECONCINI. My recollection is that on the farm bill, I think it was, we had this problem of technical amendments and we needed to pass the bill. If my recollection is correct, we decided the majority and minority leaders would put together those technical amendments. As to what is technical, I am just trying to find some resolution here because I could go over, too, for technical amendments.

I wonder if there were some formula that could satisfy the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. DOLE. I do not have any problem with the Senator from Alabama offering technical amendments. I know he is a learned jurist and would only do it in complete good faith. I would think anything the Senator from Alabama would offer would be welcome. I think on the general principle, we would want it technically correct, so I do not quarrel with the Senator from Alabama.

Others are afraid that what might be technical could also be a matter of substance and that they have not much interest in it. So let me do this. Let us first agree that we will come in tomorrow morning at probably an early hour, that at 10 a.m. there be a vote on the Armstrong amendment.

Mr. LEVIN. I would like to lead off with an amendment, with 20 minutes equally divided, prior to the Armstrong amendment being voted on.

Mr. DOLE. Subject to an amendment by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, an amendment to the Armstrong amendment.

Mr. LEVIN. Twenty minutes equally divided because we have debated this issue tonight I think.

Mr. DOLE. Twenty minutes equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am very reluctant to even object because the leader is trying to get us out of this, but after a day's discussion, I am not aware of the contents of the Levin amendment and it is not clear to me why we would want to qualify one amendment, but not other amendments.

Mr. DECONCINI. He could offer an amendment now. There is nothing prohibiting him from doing it.

Mr. LEVIN. The debate tonight was on the question of the nonrecourse CCC loans and the student loans, Government-guaranteed loans. This amendment makes it clear that they would not indeed be covered by the Armstrong amendment because I think many of us have great concerns that we might not pay our obligations, that banks therefore might not make loans to students and that CCC loans would be in some doubt. We want to clarify that. We are very nervous about the language of the Senator's amendment and would simply make clear that that amendment does not apply the way some of the sponsors said it would apply to those loans.

Mr. DOLE. Could the Senator not offer that amendment now?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Let us take that amendment up now.

Mr. LEVIN. I can offer it tonight. I do not know whether we need a rollcall tonight or not. I would like to circulate it, if I may have at least a few minutes, perhaps 5 or 10, to let some of the people who have raised questions about the Armstrong amendment see if it meets their concerns. So if you give me 10 minutes I probably could offer it. You could take the Metzenbaum amendment in the meantime.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I do not want to inconvenience my colleagues, but I think I must say if we do not continue this evening then I think we are looking at a long evening tomorrow, on Thursday. So I would ask unanimous consent that we temporarily set aside the Armstrong amendment so the Senator from Ohio may offer his amendment, which we can agree to, and that there be no more rollcall votes this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1667

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will immediately report the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM], for himself, Mr. EXON, Mr. GORE, Mr. BOREN, and Mr. BINGAMAN, proposes an amendment numbered 1667.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, insert a new section 3 and renumber succeeding sections accordingly: "Prior to each fiscal year, the President shall transmit to the Congress a proposed budget for the United States Government for that fiscal year in which total outlays are not greater than total receipts. The President may also recommend an alternative budget in which total outlays exceed total receipts, which shall be accompanied by a detailed explanation of the need for such excess."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order.

Those Senators engaged in conversations are asked to leave the Chamber. We cannot proceed until the Senate is in order.

The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I have good news for my colleagues in the Senate. Yesterday my colleagues in the Senate rejected by a vote of 54 to 44 the amendment that I now find is acceptable and which I have sent to the desk on behalf of myself, Senator EXON, Senator GORE, and Senator BOREN. This amendment is the one that was offered having to do with the President's responsibility to send to Congress a proposed budget in which total outlays are not greater than total receipts, and it also provided that the President had the right to send an alternative budget in which total outlays exceed total receipts with a detailed explanation of the need for such excess. It places the responsibility on the President to come forward with a balanced budget and, if it is not balanced, to indicate clearly to the Congress why it is not balanced.

Now, yesterday my colleagues in the Senate saw fit to turn this amendment down. They did not think that the President should be called upon to send us such a balanced budget. But lo and behold, 24 hours later, there is a different point of view.

Now, I am not totally unaware of the circumstances. Somewhere along the line it was learned that there were certain Members of this body who were prepared to vote against the constitutional amendment without this language but who might be prevailed upon to vote for it if the language were included. And so suddenly 54 Members who voted against it yesterday are now switching signals and saying, "Well, if that is the way we have to pick up one or more votes, then we are willing to call the President into play."

Now, I think it is a rather unbelievable procedure to use for us to decide as to whether the President should or should not be involved in this budgetary process based on whether or not it makes it possible or hopeful to pass the constitutional amendment, but I guess that is part of the legislative process and it does not necessarily have to be very logical.

Therefore, I am told that this amendment will now be accepted. I think it should have been accepted in the first instance. I do not think it makes the constitutional amendment a good amendment. I do not think it still should be passed, but I think it makes it a better amendment than what it would be without it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I think the most logical explanation to my friend and colleague from Ohio of the dramatic turnaround in the attitude of the Senate on this matter is that it is just one of those miracles that occur from time to time and probably not because of the persuasive talents of either the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Nebraska, but at least it has happened and I think it is good. There is a long story behind what happened and I think all of the players know what that story is.

Mr. President, the Senate will soon move to a vote for final passage of historic legislation to require a balanced Federal budget. I have been a longtime proponent of such an amendment and look forward to finally enacting this constitutional mandate of fiscal discipline.

I am an original cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 13, the balanced budget and spending limitation constitutional amendment which was introduced on the first day of the 99th Congress. Certainly, the deficit crisis is the most important issue facing this body. While a constitutional amendment will not magically balance the budget, it is a long-range measure which could help prevent future Congresses and administrations from reenacting the fiscal and economic mistakes of the past.

I cosponsored Senate Joint Resolution 13 because I have been a longtime fiscal conservative and strongly believe that a government, like a family or a business cannot continue to spend more than it has without facing financial ruin. As introduced, Senate Joint Resolution 13 contained an appropriate balance of legislative and executive responsibility in balancing the Federal budget.

However, the proposed amendment underwent revision in the Senate Judiciary Committee. The proposal which emerged dropped all reference to the executive branch.

I believe that it is crucial for the executive branch to exert leadership in the effort to balance the Federal budget. The executive branch administers the programs and policies approved by Congress and has immediate accesss to the information necessary to produce a balanced budget.

The Metz-Exon-Gore amendment simply requires the President to recommend a budget which is in balance or surplus, or explain why the Congress should adopt a budget which contains a deficit. This amendment does not alter any other provision of the balanced budget amendment. In theory, this amendment mirrors the provision in the Gramm-Rudman law which requires the President to submit budgets which meet the Gramm-Rudman deficit targets.

If adopted, Congress will maintain its full authority over the Federal purse strings and may dispose or adopt the President's recommendations as it sees fit. This amendment would only formalize the President's leadership role in the budget process.

Mr. President, not only will adoption of this amendment improve our chances of securing sufficient votes to pass the balanced budget constitutional amendment, it will strengthen the proposed constitutional amendment and help insure its success.

Mr. SIMON. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. EXON. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. SIMON. I simply want to commend my colleague from Ohio and my colleague from Nebraska as well as Senator GORE from Tennessee. The three of them really have done a yeoman's job here and we are pleased to have this amendment.

Mr. THURMOND. Addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we did not think this amendment was necessary but some of the Members felt they could not vote for this amendment without it, and with a slight change in the amendment we are willing to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

So the amendment (No. 1667) was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let the record reflect I always did think the amendment had some merit. It was only overnight that it occurred to me how much merit.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I assumed that is why the Senator voted against it yesterday and for it today.

Mr. DOLE. That is correct. I am a slow learner.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I understand.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest further proceeding under the quorum be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in view of taking this matter up tomorrow morning, I would ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee meet at 3 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. METZENBAUM. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BYRD. Reserving the right to object, that has not been cleared on this side, I do not believe.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, what happened to the request? Has it been withdrawn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina retains the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent request has been withdrawn by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wish to thank my colleagues for the progress we have made today on the balanced budget amendment. I am advised, up until this last quorum call, that there had only been about 7 or 10 minutes devoted to quorum calls all day. That is an indication that maybe the electronic media will bring about some discipline; either that, or longer speeches.

But, in any event, we are about to conclude the first day of radio coverage since the Panama Canal debates. My own view is that it has been successful. We have accomplished a great deal. We have had some votes. We have had excellent debates on both sides. I hope that we could complete action, with the exception of final passage, on Senate Resolution 225 tomorrow morning.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, when the Senate considered the balanced budget amendment in 1982, we had an annual deficit of $128 billion and a national debt of $1,147 billion. By contrast, we now have an estimated deficit for fiscal year 1986 of $203 billion and a debt of $2,112 billion, It is ironic to note that if we were able to pass and implement a fiscal year 1987 budget with a deficit at the 1982 level, it would be heralded as one of the great accomplishments of this century. The failure of the U.S. House of Representatives to pass the balanced budget amendment in 1982 has directly contributed to the enormous growth of our national debt which will be carried ahead for generations to come.

I strongly support this effort to put into the supreme law of the land a requirement to balance the Federal budget.

I cannot emphasize enough, however, the importance to look toward the spending side of the budget as opposed to resorting to tax increases. Since 1975, receipts have averaged 18.6 percent of GNP while spending averaged 22.4 percent. Our deficits are not caused by our being undertaxed but rather because spending has risen out of control. Revenues increased last year by over 10 percent but spending increased by over 11 percent.

Occasionally, I analyze Federal spending for the Members of the Senate based upon the monthly statement of debt, receipts and outlays published by the Treasury Department. This is particularly relevant during our discussion of the balanced budget amendment.

For the month ending January 31, 1986, total public debt outstanding was $1,963 billion—that is $1.9 trillion. This compares to $1,680 billion for the same period in 1984, an increase of $283 billion in 12 months. For the latest census data, this equals $8,475 per person and $22,972 per household. This represents a 16.8-percent increase of total debt over last year and a 413-percent increase over 1970.

The estimate of borrowing from the public to finance the Federal debt for the year is $204 billion. Total capital available in U.S. markets is $742 billion of which Government borrowing takes a 27-percent share. At the current rate, we will have $2,064 billion in total public debt by the end of this fiscal year. This amount is especially staggering when compared to the debt of $383 billion for 1970.

For the month of January, we amassed $76.7 billion in receipts and $82.8 billion in outlays, leaving a deficit for the month of $6.5 billion. Since we started this fiscal year last October, the Federal Government has taken in $253.9 billion and spent $336.8 billion. At this rate we will have accumulated for the year $777.1 billion in receipts, $975.3 billion in outlays, and a deficit of $202.8 billion.

These comments are aimed at encouraging my colleagues into making the tough decisions to limit Federal spending in order to bring down the deficit when we consider the budget resolution, authorizing and appropriating legislation. For this reason we must provide a constitutional change in the way we do business; 44 States, including Oklahoma, set for themselves stringent requirements to balance their budgets, it is certainly right for the U.S. Government to do the same. I urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, we are debating this proposed constitutional amendment for one reason and one reason only—our own fiscal irresponsibility. Time after time after time, we have increased Federal spending without voting new taxes to pay for this spending. As a result, we have annual Federal deficits of $200 billion and a national debt of $2 trillion. Unless drastic steps are taken—including a constitutional amendment to require a balanced Federal budget—our Nation's economic future is bleak.

I do not believe the threat of deficits on our economic future can be overstated. As I, along with many others, have said many times before—deficits are a mortgage on our economic future. In May 1983, I noted on the floor that the national debt was $1.2 trillion, or about $5,200 per person. The national debt is now nearly $2 trillion, or about $8,500 per person. That represents an astonishing increase of nearly 67 percent in just 3 years. If we apportion the national debt among the 82 million taxpayers in the country, the individual share of the debt is roughly $25,800. Each taxpayer will pay $1,800 this year for interest alone. That is more than the total income tax bill of a typical family of four earning $20,000 a year. For 1985, our budget outlays are estimated to have exceeded our receipts by approximately $222 billion. For 1986, the deficit is estimated to be roughly $180 billion.

As long as we continue to approve deficits of this magnitude, the amount of our Nation's resources that go toward paying the interest on the debt will increase. Fewer resources will, therefore, be available to pay for education, welfare, health care, and defense. What concerns me most about the deficit is the impact it will have on future generations—our children and our children's children. They will be the ones who will pay for our fiscal irresponsibility—and not simply in terms of the interest on the debt with which they will be saddled. They will also suffer deprivation because of an inadequate Federal investment in those things that are future-oriented—education, health research, and the Nation's infrastructure.

As chairman of the international trade subcommittee, I have become particularly sensitive to the impact of deficit spending on our foreign trade imbalance. Deficits contribute to high interest rates and an overvalued dollar. The high dollar, in turn, penalizes American exports in international markets—while cheap foreign imports flood our markets at home. The effect on American industry and American workers is devastating. Well over 1 million trade-related jobs have been lost to our economy in recent years, with import-sensitive and export-dependent industry alike suffering the trade symptoms of our bloated Federal budget. In my State of Missouri, factories have closed and farmers face prices depressed by our decline in agricultural exports. Mr. President, the Trade Subcommittee has before it a myriad of bills aimed at reducing our trade deficit; yet, the effects of this legislation will be negligible unless we can reduce simultaneously our Federal deficit. While part of the blame for our trade deficit legitimately rests with our trading partners, the hands of the U.S. Congress are not clean. Because of our fiscal irresponsibility, we must share the blame.

I believe an amendment to the Constitution is a very serious step that should only be taken as a last resort. However, we have reached the end of our rope as far as the deficit goes. If there were ever justification for such action, this is surely it. This amendment would force us to do what we seem to be unable to do of our own volition—make the hard spending and tax decisions needed to move the budget back toward balance.

Mr. SIMON. What principles govern the definition of "outlays" and "receipts" and "revenues?"

Mr. HATCH. As the report of the Judiciary Committee makes clear, outlays and receipts are defined by contemporary budget practice as defined by the "Glossary of Terms Used in the Budget Process."

Use of the word "revenues" in section 2 is governed by the use of the term in article 1, section 7, as I clarified in my opening address. In a few words, "revenue" is not intended to imply that a constitutional majority is necessary to increase fees on Government services, from Government publications to inland waterways, but clearly applies the application of this section to increases in taxes.

Mr. SIMON. Are the following receipts or outlays under Senate Joint Resolution 225? First, what about borrowing from IMF or any other source?

Mr. HATCH. Neither. Borrowing is the difference between outlays and receipts and is not included in either term. As your question implies, this principle applies to all forms of borrowing. The balanced budget amendment approved by the Senate in 1982 specified that "receipts includes all receipts * * * except those derived from borrowing." This principle, however, is so evident from the language of Senate Joint Resolution 225 and the intent of its authors that this explicit exclusion of borrowing as either outlays or receipts is not necessary.

Mr. SIMON. Second, what about revenues from the Outer Continental Shelf?

Mr. HATCH. Those would be treated as offsetting receipts.

Mr. SIMON. Third, what are the moneys received from sale of postage stamps?

Mr. HATCH. Those would also be treated as offsetting receipts.

Mr. SIMON. Fourth, what about user fees and inspection fees?

Mr. HATCH. As with the other items mentioned by the Senator, they would be treated as offsetting receipts.

Mr. SIMON. Fifth, and what about any income from Government-owned land or property?

Mr. HATCH. That income would be treated as offsetting receipts.

Mr. SIMON. Sixth, what about revenues of TVA or Bonneville Power?

Mr. HATCH. These would also be offsetting fees.

Mr. SIMON. Seventh, what would the role of capital assets be?

Mr. HATCH. Capital assets would be treated as outlays. I would like to clarify further, however, that the cost of the capital asset could not be depreciated over its lifetime in the computation of outlays and receipts.

Mr. SIMON. Eighth, what about capital assets that produce income?

Mr. HATCH. Likewise, they would be outlays with no depreciation.

Mr. SIMON. Ninth, what about Social Security trust fund revenues?

Mr. HATCH. The interest earnings of Social Security trust funds would be treated as offsetting receipts. This, of course, does not change the fact that these funds are earmarked by law for one purpose—namely, to support the Social Security System. It merely means that this interest would be counted exclusively for budget purposes—as a receipt.

Mr. SIMON. Tenth, and what about the retirement of the national debt?

Mr. HATCH. Debt retirement is neither outlays nor receipts. Debt retirement is the difference between receipts and outlays and is not included in either term. Once again, the balanced budget amendment adopted in 1982 specified that "outlays shall include all outlays * * * except those for the repayment of debt principal." For the same reasons as with borrowing, however, it is not necessary to include an axiomatic proposition in this balanced budget amendment.

Mr. SIMON. May a reserve fund established by a surplus in prior years be used to offset a current deficit?

Mr. HATCH. Such a practice would reduce the problems of implementing section 1 and would still constrain the development of a cumulative deficit over a period of years. Withdrawals from this fund should be treated as current receipts. This practice would permit the balance of the budget over a number of years, rather than requiring a balance in each year, as long as a surplus is accumuated first.

One of the ways that Congress might elect to handle an unanticipated downturn in receipts near the end of a fiscal year or to fund an unexpected surge in outlays perhaps due to a recession would be to have available a contingency fund. Several States, including Michigan, which have balanced budget requirements, have adopted similar contingency or "rainy day" funds. This contingency fund would be essentially a national savings program. In any given fiscal year, Congress might elect to take some of its receipts and set them aside as a contingency fund. In that year, the amount in the fund would be listed as both a receipt and an outlay. It would be an outlay because it would be "paid" into an account to collect interest until needed. Then, in a future year when it is needed to offset a receipts shortfall or an outlay overrun, the amount brought back into the Federal budget from the contingency fund would be treated as a receipt. As a receipt, it could offset other outlays in that fiscal year of need.

A contingency fund would not be borrowing against the future and postponing debt indefinitely into tomorrow. Borrowing against the future is the practice that has precipitated the current deficit and debt crisis. The important principle that distinguishes a contingency fund from borrowing is that the fund is comprised of actual funds saved from the past. A contingency fund is a saving principle, not a borrowing concept.

A contingency fund could also be used to make Federal budgetary policies under Senate Joint Resolution 225 countercyclical. During surplus years, Congress could set aside a contingency fund. Later, if the economy fell into a recession, the fund could be used to finance the extra entitlement spending caused by some additional unemployment and to offset the downturn in receipts. As the economy later cycled into a recovery, the fund could be replenished with the added receipts generated by fuller employment and higher productivity.

As I mentioned earlier, several States have used these contingency funds to their advantage. This is not a mandatory program under Senate Joint Resolution 225. It is only one of several options that Congress may wish to explore to make the balanced budget norm of Senate Joint Resolution 225 a wise and workable policy.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, the Senate will shortly vote on whether to adopt or reject Senate Joint Resolution 225, a proposed constitutional amendment to require the balancing of Federal budgets. It will be an important vote for the Senate. No one in this body, I am confident, takes lightly the prospect of amending the Constitution of the United States.

The eloquence and the wisdom of our Constitution rests in its embodiment of the fundamental principles which have guided this Nation. In considering amendments to it, we must proceed with all due care and caution. We must define just what we are attempting to achieve and determine whether an amendment to our Constitution is the appropriate means to accomplish our purpose.

Some 3½ years ago, I addressed the Senate on Senate Joint Resolution 58, a proposed balanced budget and tax limitation constitutional amendment then under consideration by the 97th Congress. I said then, and I will say again today, that the Senate should not attempt to address—or pretend to address—the fiscal imbalance of the Federal Government by way of a constitutional amendment.

Although I will not dwell upon the point, I must acknowledge the gravity of the economic circumstances which have set the stage for debate on Senate Joint Resolution 225. The uncertain hope of recently enacted legislation and of optimistic economic projections notwithstanding, the fiscal condition of the Federal Government is indeed grave. Recent and continuing additions to the national debt portend a lasting strain upon future Federal budgets and upon the economy of the United States. Like a dark cloud, the growing national debt literally hangs over the prospects of our posterity.

Proponents of the proposed constitutional amendment would have us believe that the gravity of the general problem itself stands as a sufficient argument for this specific proposed solution. It does not.

Opponents of the proposed constitutional amendment know—just as well as its proponents do—that the Federal budget has been in balance only once in the past 25 years. Opponents are equally aware that the national debt has increased nearly sevenfold over the past quarter century. Opponents of Senate Joint Resolution 225 lament, as all Senators must, the unfortunate legacy this generation is leaving to subsequent generations. Do these facts and figures in and of themselves—acknowledged by opponents and proponents alike—prove that a constitutional amendment is the solution to the problem of the fiscal imbalance of the Federal Government? Of course not.

Dire fiscal circumstances have again brought a proposal for a balanced budget constitutional amendment to the floor of the U.S. Senate. Yet there is little reason to believe that a constitutional amendment would address these dire circumstances. I must oppose Senate Joint Resolution 225 because the economic proscription it proposes is not the province of our Constitution; because means other than constitutional are both necessary and appropriate; and because the proposed amendment is more of a gesture than it is a solution.

The economic policy proscription of the proposed resolution does not belong in our Constitution. The U.S. Constitution has stood the test of 200 years so well because it is a fundamental statement of the basic rights of our citizens and a fundamental statement setting forth the organization of our Government. It has served as a basis and an inspiration for the constitutions of other nations the world over. Since the passage of the Bill of Rights, this Constitution has been amended only 16 times. Eight of these amendments tinkered with the organization of the Federal Government, such as the establishment of a two-term limitation of the Presidency and the provision for the direct election of U.S. Senators. Only 6 of these 16 amendments involved matters of fundamental rights, such as the abolition of slavery and the extension of suffrage to women, blacks, and 18-year-olds. These are rightfully matters of constitutional importance.

The remaining two amendments are the 18th amendment, which established prohibition, and the 21st amendment, which repealed prohibition. The Senate would do well to recall the constitutional travesty of the 18th amendment. Although well intended, it was unenforceable; it did not fulfill its intended purpose; and far from solving problems, it multiplied them.

The question of Federal spending, revenues, and the relationship between the two are political matters, not constitutional matters. Matters of macroeconomic policy, such as the proscription of Federal budget deficits, simply do not belong in the U.S. Constitution. National macroeconomic policy should be, and indeed can only be, left to the political process. Therefore, means other than constitutional are both appropriate and necessary for the pursuit of balance in Federal budgets.

At the close of the first session of this, the 99th Congress, the political process did at long last produce a significant step toward restoring the Federal Government to fiscal balance. I refer, of course, to the enactment of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, which is better known as the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction measure. The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings measure establishes, by statutory means, a binding and self-enforcing mechanism to achieve a balanced Federal budget by 1991. We should by no means regard the enactment of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings as having put the matter of deficit reduction behind us. Neither should we dismiss it before it has had a chance to work. Rather, we must regard it as a significant first step in the direction of restoring fiscal balance and as a tool to serve that end. I was an original cosponsor of this legislation.

Some proponents assert that we now need this proposed constitutional amendment to secure for the long term that which Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will achieve in the short run—a balanced Federal budget. I disagree.

Gramm-Rudman-Hollings imposes, via statute, a binding requirement of a balanced budget for fiscal year 1991. It also establishes a strengthened budget process and an enforcement mechanism as necessary to reach the balanced budget by 1991. By contrast, the proposed constitutional amendment would simply declare deficits unconstitutional. It offers no clue as to how the Congress is to achieve compliance except for the implicit imperative that Congress enact implementing or enforcing legislation.

What form might such implementing legislation take? The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings measure offers the best indicator of how the Congress might enforce upon itself a balanced budget requirement. That is, the implementation of the balanced budget constitutional amendment might well require legislation along the lines of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. If Gramm-Rudman-Hollings works as intended, I would favor keeping it in force past 1991 in order to maintain budget balance. If Gramm-Rudman-Hollings does not succeed, it raises a host of questions as to the enforcement of a balanced budget constitutional requirement. The recent debate on the proposed resolution has done very little to dismiss such questions regarding enforcement of the amendment, its probable circumvention, and the likelihood of the resultant constitutional entanglement of the three branches of our Government.

Proponents of the proposed amendment argue further, that constitutional action is now required because a constitutional question hangs over the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings measure. The constitutionality of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is indeed in question and the subject of current review by the Supreme Court. Rather than rushing to adopt a constitutional amendment, however, I believe the Congress should await the forthcoming decision of the Supreme Court. Should the Supreme Court strike down the automatic sequestration provisions of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, I believe the Congress should either modify Gramm-Rudman-Hollings as neccessary to render it entirely constitutional or rely upon its secondary provisions for sequestration.

Proponents of Senate Joint Resolution 225 also argue that a constitutional amendment is now necessary because a mere majority in both the House and Senate could, absent a Presidential veto, revise, weaken, or repeal Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Under the proposed amendment, a three-fifths supermajority of both the House of Representatives and the Senate would be required to allow a Federal budget deficit. I submit that revising or repealing Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, even if it requires only a mere majority in both the House and Senate, as well as a quiescent presidential veto pen, would be no easy matter. More importantly, under most circumstances, I would prefer that waiver of a balanced budget imperative require only a majority rather than a three-fifths supermajority. The three-fifths requirement of the proposed amendment would incline the Congress to chronic stalemate and paralysis by placing in the hands of a minority of either the House or the Senate too much power. It is impossible to foresee the full extent of the dangers such a situation might pose in the face of an economic or other national emergency.

The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction measure, as a creature of the Congress, will be subject to political forces and open to legislative revision. Since I feel Federal spending and revenue matters are properly matters for political consideration, I feel that the statutory approach to fiscal restraint as represented by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is appropriate. I also feel that we must exhaust such alternatives before considering a constitutional approach.

Finally, since I believe that the proposed constitutional amendment is an inappropriate and ineffective means to pursue an appropriate goal, I feel that its adoption by the Senate would be an empty gesture. An abstract declaration that Federal budget deficits shall be unconstitutional does nothing to address the spending and revenue decisions necessary to achieve budget balance. In this sense, Senate Joint Resolution 225 is little more than wishful thinking. It is a pretentious exercise which detracts from the actual business of deficit reduction by diverting energies and by giving the illusion of addressing the problem. To the extent that this exercise is a facile substitute for real effort to restore balance to the Federal budget, and to the extent that it displaces other efforts, it does more harm than good.

A vote for a balanced budget constitutional amendment is a relatively easy vote. It is not a vote for specific spending cuts. It is not a vote for specific tax increases. Supporters of the amendment will subsequently represent their vote for Senate Joint Resolution 225 as proof of their commitment to fiscal responsibility. Of course, however, a vote for this resolution proves nothing of the sort. The constitutional imperative Senate Joint Resolution 225 would impose is so far removed from the practical matter of deficit reduction as to be irrelevant.

In summary, I oppose Senate Joint Resolution because it is an inappropriate and merely illusory solution to the problem of the Federal Government's fiscal imbalance. I therefore urge my colleagues to reject Senate Joint Resolution 225.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise to indicate my support for the pending amendment to the Constitution to bring about a balanced Federal budget. I must confess that I have no great enthusiasm for opening up our Nation's founding document for surgery, but on balance I believe now, as I did in 1982, that this is a wise and responsible course.

Passage of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings budget proposal last year was a watershed event in contemporary American history. It represented the ratification of a national concensus that deficit reduction, painful though it may be, is item No. 1 on the U.S. Government's agenda. It has been at the top of the people's list for years and we, at the Federal level, have finally gotten in line.

Passage of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, however, has caused some to reverse their position on this amendment, arguing that a constitutional amendment is now superfluous. I have two problems with that line of reasoning.

First, there is a significant body of opinion, especially among opponents of this amendment, that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is unconstitutional and will soon be thrown out by the Supreme Court. In that event, which I would not welcome, we would be left with no dedicated mechanism or visible mandate for deficit reduction.

More importantly, defeat of this amendment sends exactly the wrong signal to the American people. Our voting down this amendment will threaten the political momentum for deficit reduction which Gramm-Rudman-Hollings has generated. And it may very well be the final push which brings two more States into the call for an article V convention, which would, in my view, be a constitutional catastrophe.

Neither am I convinced by those who argue that this particular amendment should be defeated on vagueness grounds. Many of those same critics opposed the 1982 Balanced Budget Amendment because it was too specific. The Constitution has survived because its generality permitted flexible application; amendments should follow that same standard.

Perhaps the most disturbing argument raised by the opponents of this amendment is: Since it does not deal with an issue of fundamental rights, it does not belong in our Constitution. If the protection of future generations of Americans from oppressive debts incurred by the current generation is not an issue of fundamental rights, I don't know what is.

Among our Founding Fathers, Thomas Jefferson articulated best our moral obligation to live within our means and the risk that debt presents to the survival of our Republic. He wrote, "We should consider ourselves unauthorized to saddle posterity with our debts, and morally bound to pay them ourselves." He referred to the national debt as "swindling futurity on a large scale." Perhaps if Jefferson had been in Philadelphia instead of Paris in 1783 our Constitution might have settled this matter at the outset.

Four years after he left the Presidency, he wrote, "Ought not the right of each successive generation to be guaranteed against the dissipations and corruptions of those preceding, by a fundamental provision of our Constitution?"

On behalf of Americans young and unborn the U.S. Senate should respond today in the affirmative.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today in support of Senate Joint Resolution 225, a constitutional amendment to balance the Federal Government's budget.

This amendment completes the job we started last session to achieve a real and lasting solution to the serious Federal deficit problem that has led to a doubling of the total outstanding debt of the U.S. Government in the last 6 years.

Today, just to pay the interest on the almost $2 trillion of Federal debt, we will have to spend $142.7 billion, making those interest payments in fiscal 1986 the third largest single item in the Federal budget.

In fact, those interest payments will make up a full 60 percent of the amount the Federal Government must borrow this fiscal year to meet the projected deficit.

Late last year we passed the Emergency Deficit Control and Reduction Act, known as the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill, which mandated declining deficit targets over the next 5 years. I supported this law.

Some have suggested this constitutional amendment is therefore no longer necessary now that we have Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

They are mistaken.

This constitutional amendment seeks to carry on to a logical conclusion the spirit of deficit reduction and elimination first embodied in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction process under which we are currently operating is not written in stone.

It has a limited life of 5 years and can be changed by Congress at any time.

It is true it provides us with a transitional period to strive toward balancing the Federal budget and eliminating the deficit.

But in reality it only achieves its purpose for a single year!

What about fiscal 1992, and the years beyond?

Are we honestly to believe that once we manage to balance the Federal budget under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings process for 1 year we will be cured of the chronic deficit disorder for all time?

I doubt it.

That is why this amendment is so important.

It seeks to pick up where Gramm-Rudman-Hollings leaves off and provide a continuing, mandatory requirement of Congress to link spending and taxing decisions; a linkage which I believe is sorely lacking in our current budget and fiscal decisonmaking process.

We need the backdrop of this constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget, in order to impose fiscal restraints on Congress and the executive branch.

We all know Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is on shaky legal ground, which should be resolved in several months.

Even with a favorable resolution in the courts, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings will always remain on uncertain legislative ground because of its statutory nature.

What Congress has done it can undo.

If we are serious in achieving and maintaining a balanced Federal budget, as I believe we are, we must create a rigorous and disciplined environment under which Congress and the President are forced to work out a budget which will take effect on the first day of the new fiscal year and pay for itself throughout that year.

This amendment is the only lasting way to provide us that much-needed environment.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support Senate Joint Resolution 225.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I speak in opposition to Senate Joint Resolution 225, a proposal to amend the Constitution to require a balanced Federal budget.

We have placed before us today the most basic questions about our system of government, its laws and institutions: What is a Constitution? Is it what we take to be fundamental law? Is it a framework of government? It is, of course, both.

The Constitution, the Bill of Rights, and subsequent amendments to the Constitution were, and remain, an enumeration of the principles that guide our Government. The Constitution embodies fundamental law, not the evanescent ideas of whatever social and economic policies may prevail in a particular era. The Constitution also establishes a governmental structure, with the powers of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches set forth. Restrictions on the powers of the individual States are described. The rights of individuals—to free speech, to freedom of political assembly, to the unfettered practice of religious beliefs—are delineated.

Citizens vote for, and elect, the Congress and the President to make choices. As elected officials we must choose how, and from whom, to collect the resources to pay for the policies we decide to pursue. And of course we must decide how to spend those revenues: How much on defense; how much on education; how much on roads; how much on scientific research.

On its face, the proposition before us is simple—deceptively so. It requires that outlays equal receipts for any fiscal year unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of the Congress provide for a specific excess of outlays. Any bill to increase revenues must be passed by a majority of those duly sworn in both Houses. Finally, a provision is made to waive the requirement for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

In the history of our Republic we have been exceptionally sparing in the amendments we have added to our Constitution. Save the original 10 amendments—the Bill of Rights—we have added but 16. One amendment gave us prohibition, another took it away. Most of the others have dealt with basic questions of how we organize our Government and its relation to our citizens—the terms of Presidential office and the machinery of Presidential succession; the age, sex, and race of voters.

Today, it is true, there is a growing demand for an amendment to balance the Federal budget. Yet we need to be absolutely clear about the problem for which such a drastic solution is now being propounded. Between 1792 and 1986, the Federal Government ran 89 deficits greater than $1 million. That's 89 deficits in 195 years—about half the time. Federal deficits were not unusual events, but neither were they sustained. In the 19th century, for example, Federal deficits were largely the result of war expenditures. These were subsequently counterbalanced by budget surpluses.

This dynamic is no longer in evidence. The last year the Federal Government ran a surplus was 1969. Yet, it is true that during the 1970's, Federal deficits were deliberate. Indeed, during that period the deliberate, intentional nature of those deficits was openly acknowledged, and generally approved. When our distinguished Secretary of State George P. Shultz was Director of the Office of Management and Budget, he prepared for President Nixon what was known as a "full employment budget"—that is, a budget which provided for outlays that would equal revenues were the economy at full employment. The shortfall was designed to stimulate the economy towards that goal. The arrangment was not perfect, and perhaps could never be. But it was moderate, and above all it was public. Such cannot be said of the deficits we face today.

Neither economics nor history, Mr. President, is on the side of those who today offer this balanced budget amendment. Requiring that outlays equal receipts for any fiscal year, this proposed amendment to our fundamental law neglects to define these terms. Nor does this proposed amendment indicate whether outlays and receipts of the Social Security trust funds, which we have placed off-budget, are to count in the calculation of the deficit. Under Gramm-Rudman they do. But would they under this constitutional amendment? Mr. President, on this as on other critical matters we are left uninformed.

We would do well, Mr. President, to recall the 1979 testimony of the distinguished economist, Charles L. Schultze, then chairman of President Carter's Council of Economic Advisors and now senior fellow at the Brookings Institution. Speaking against an earlier incarnation of the proposal before us today, Dr. Schultze observed:

> As part of the enduring Constitution, the amendment would have to attempt a definition of the meaning of expenditures and revenues in a way that could last for generations. Imagine the task facing the Founding Fathers in 1787 trying to define a budget in a way that would be applicable to the 1970's. Can you imagine Alexander Hamilton dealing with revolving bonds and trust funds and new obligation authority? It's almost inconceivable to do that definitionally in a way that will last against the inventiveness of the human mind.

As for history, Mr. President, it reminds us that the very idea of a fiscal year is predicated on an agricultural economy that we have long since outgrown. We are no longer organized in such a way that we plant the wheat in the spring, watch it grow in the summer, and then harvest it in the fall, at which time we take account of how well off we are. No, Mr. President, we can no longer just measure when the wool clip comes in, or the apple crop, or whatever else used to be the agricultural mainstays of our economy.

Indeed, economic cycles in modern industrial economies such as ours obey no such rhythms of nature. Their study has in fact long been the province of the National Bureau of Economic Research, founded at Columbia University in the 1920's under the direction of a great American economist,

C. Wesley Mitchell, and headed until not so long ago by the distinguished Dr. Arthur Burns. The researches into the business cycle at the bureau and at other institutions have established some clear patterns in these matters. And of these we were reminded recently by an article in the Wall Street Journal of March 10, 1986. There we learn that the average duration of business-cycle expansions is 33 months.

Under such modern conditions what then will a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget each fiscal year mean? It is elemental to predict, Mr. President, that recessions will become depressions. For we have, as have other modern industrial nations, deliberately fashioned countercyclical devices to deal with the harsh realities of business cycles. Under current policies, in times of recession the Government tends to spend more—more in unemployment insurance benefits, and other programs to those adversely affected. At the same time receipts to the Federal Government inevitably fall. As businesses produce less and sell less, and as families earn less income, tax receipts are necessarily reduced. Such mechanisms that we have wisely chosen to build into our political economy will then be hamstrung by the kind of amendment we are being asked to consider here today.

But allow me to emphasize once again, Mr. President: The deficits we face today are not only unprecedented in size; they also present us with a fundamentally new problem. Not without reason has the Federal deficit become the central political argument of the age. Let us not forget that this situation has come into being precisely when both the executive branch and the Senate are controlled by Republicans.

Popular thought holds that there is something systemically wrong here. Arguments that "the system is broke" were persuasive to many, and Congress overwhelmingly voted for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings to fix it. Mr. President, I was one of 24 Senators to oppose that legislation. The fact is that our system is not broken. The simple truth is rather that this unprecedented deficit was created deliberately by the present administration. It is also true that this administration has intentionally misled the American people about these deficits. Thus, when the Reagan administration proposed its first budget 4 years ago, a budget deficit of $91.5 billion was predicted. As I told my colleagues on the Budget Committee during the markup session last week:

> Starting in 1982, the administration began lying to this committee. They weren't making mistakes. They were telling what they knew or judged to be untruths. They would overestimate revenues, overestimate spending. In 1982, they came here with a very specific and consciously misleading budget that showed that they would not cross into a three digit deficit for fiscal year 1983.

Contrary to the prevailing wisdom, Mr. President, the present deficit crisis is not the result of policy out of control. No, it is the result of policy in place—the intentional policy of this administration.

This being the case, we must then ask ourselves how will future executives behave if constrained by a constitutional amendment such as proposed here today. The answer most likely is that they will misrepresent fact, as this administration has chosen to do. The only difference will be that future executives will, by the amendment proposed here today, be forced to do so. What law, Mr. President, what constitutional amendment will stop elected officials intent upon deceiving the American people?

It is, Mr. President, precisely because the Founders had no illusions about the motives and intentions of elected officials that they labored to produce a constitution. For in this manner they sought to establish an enduring framework to withstand the petty whims and deep-seated ambitions of individual men and momentary majorities. As Hamilton wrote in Federalist No. 34:

> Constitutions of civil government are not to be framed upon a calculation of existing exigencies but upon a combination of these with the probable exigencies of the ages.

It would be tragic indeed, Mr. President, if today under the press of such exigencies we were to tamper with the instrument that was intended to save us from the follies and deceits now confronting us.●

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I wish to reiterate my strong and unwavering support for a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. As many of my colleagues know, I have sponsored or cosponsored such legislation ever since I came to the Senate in 1977. Back then, the need for this amendment was compelling and urgent. Unfortunately, things have only gone from bad to worse in the intervening years. In 1977, we faced a deficit of some $53 billion—a sum that seems minuscule in comparison to the $200 billion deficit we are battling today. The national debt back then hovered at $709 billion. Today it exceeds $2 trillion. Last year, we paid $130 billion in interest charges alone on the Federal debt. This accounts for 14 percent of all Federal spending—or $1 of every $7. Worse still, the Grace Commission estimates that if we continue at this rate, by the year 2000 the interest on the debt alone will top $1 trillion a year.

It is high time to get out of debt. Clearly, a balanced budget is an idea whose time has not only come, but is long overdue.

Last fall we enacted Gramm-Rudman, which requires a balanced budget by 1991. Many hailed this as a great achievement and indeed, for Congress, it is. But we must not lose sight of the fact that Gramm-Rudman is only a substitute for responsibility. It only works when Congress fails to do so. What is needed is a Federal law that will permanently prohibit Government from spending more than it takes in and prohibits Congress from shirking its primary duty of fiscal responsibility.

Long-lasting and enduring Federal fiscal responsibility requires a constitutional remedy. While Gramm-Rudman is a step in the right direction, the only way to stop Congress from heaping a tremendous debt against future generations is to etch the requirement for a balanced budget into constitutional stone. Congress has to be accountable to the American people, who, time and again, have called on us for fiscal restraint in order to spur economic growth. Forty-six State constitutions, including that of my home State of Wyoming, require a balanced budget. No less should be asked of the Federal Government.

The amendment's language is clear, simple, and effective. It will ensure that the first tottering steps we've taken toward fiscal soundness with Gramm-Rudman will become the sturdy strides of a healthy Federal spending policy. As we near the Constitution's 200th anniversary, let us make sure the legacy we pass down to future generations is that of the freedom embodied in that unique document, rather than the heavy burden of an overwhelming Federal debt that will only serve to limit the freedoms of those who come after us.●

APPOINTMENT OF ROBERT PENN WARREN, AS FIRST U.S. POET-LAUREATE SETS HIGHEST STANDARDS

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise to congratulate and commend our Librarian of Congress, Daniel J. Boorstin, on his selection of Robert Penn Warren as the first Poet-Laureate of the United States.

Mr. Warren's career as a writer is a long and distinguished one. His poetry and prose have been honored in many quarters and he has rightfully earned the distinction of being the only writer to receive Pulitzer Prizes for fiction and poetry.

Born in Kentucky in 1905, Mr. Warren was graduated from Vanderbilt University, where he was a member of the influential fugitive group which included such well-known writers as John Crowe Ransom and Allen Tate. He received a master's degree from the University of California and a bachelor of literature from Oxford University, which he attended on a Rhodes scholarship. As cofounder and editor of "The Southern Review," Mr. Warren continued to build on his already important place in American literature.

His appointment as U.S. Poet Laureate-Consultant in Poetry will serve as an inspiration to the next generation of writers. It is interesting to note, in this connection that one of the fastest growing programs at the university level in this country is writing. The number of aspiring American poets and writers continues to increase, as evidenced by the keen competition among candidates for entrance into writing programs at universities and colleges throughout the Nation. At Columbia University alone, some 70 applicants vied for admission to the 20 vacancies in the school's writing program for the fall semester last year.

The Associated Writing Program sponsored by a 19-year-old association headquartered at Old Dominion University in Norfolk, VA, issues an AWP catalogue which provides program descriptions for 279 writing programs at the undergraduate and graduate level in the United States and Canada. AWP estimates that at least 5,000 undergraduates are currently enrolled in writing programs this year.

The Poetry Society of America, a New York City-based service organization representing a broad spectrum of American poets, said its membership increased in number by 200 in 1985 to 1,600 active and publishing poets. As one who has long believed that if the lessons of human experience were all written in verse we might better learn and remember them, I take great encouragement from this recent trend.

Mr. President, the position of Poetry Consultant of the Library of Congress has existed for 50 years as a privately endowed program. Upgrading that post to that of Poet Laureate will now provide young American poets with role models, as well as an incentive to aspire to the highest position in their art, just as the young politically inclined aspire to the office of the President of the United States.

As the introducer of the bill to establish the position of Poet Laureate of the United States in 1963, and having pursued the objective for over 22 years, I am truly delighted that that position has at long last been established and that it has been filled by one who will set the highest standard for those who aspire to that position.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD two editorials, one from my hometown newspaper, the Honolulu Advertiser, and the other from the Columbus, OH, Dispatch, both of which applaud the Congress for establishing the position of the U.S. Poet Laureate.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Honolulu Advertiser, Mar. 3, 1986]

A POETIC CHOICE

A danger in appointing people to government posts for their ability to express themselves is that when they say what they think it may not be what people want to hear.

This is true of Robert Penn Warren, just chosen as the nation's first poet laureate. He said, "The people who create these posts don't give a damn about poetry."

Well, that is not true of Hawaii Senator Spark Matsunaga who campaigned for years to elevate the poetry consultant to the Library of Congress to the more august sounding post of "poet laureate."

Still, Warren, 80, is a fitting choice. He is a three-time Pulitzer Prize winner, twice for poetry and once in 1947 for the novel that made him famous, "All the King's Men," which grew out of observing the late Governor Huey P. Long of Louisiana.

In addition to Pulitzers, Warren has won the Bollingen Prize, the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the National Book Award, the National Medal for Literature and a MacArthur "Genius" Award.

Warren will likely not be writing verse on demand to memorialize events and people. As when he was poetry consultant twice before, he will advise on literary programs, recommend new poets for inclusion in the Library of Congress and deliver a public reading and a lecture each year.

"To have great poetry," Walt Whitman wrote, "there must be great audiences." If having a poet laureate helps just a bit to infuse a little poetry into the prosaic lives of Americans, it will be better for poetry and for people.

[From the Columbus (OH) Dispatch, Feb. 13, 1986]

OUR OWN POET LAUREATE

For the first time in its history, the United States is going to have a poet laureate.

Tacked on to a bill in Congress last year dealing with the National Endowments of Arts and Humanities was an amendment Sen. Spark M. Matsunaga, Hawaiian Democrat and a poet, has been trying to get through for more than 20 years.

Congress approved and President Reagan signed the measure which empowers the Librarian of Congress, now Daniel J. Boorstin, to name each year a "poet laureate," combining the position with that of consultant in poetry the library has maintained for more than 50 years.

The designated poet laureate-consultant will receive a stipend of $10,000 and a salary of about $35,000 and is to produce at least one major work of poetry a year and appear at selected national ceremonies.

We think it's a fine idea. Great Britain has, of course, for centuries honored one of its leading poets with the laureate title. President Kennedy delighted poetry lovers by inviting Robert Frost to participate in his inaugural ceremony.

The new laureate's official appearances may vary greatly with the literary tastes of the incumbent president, whoever it may be, but the title itself should, as Matsunaga hopes, "give greater visibility and prestige" to poets and their work.

We also think Congress showed unusual sensitivity in timing the first appointment to come up in February. What better time than the month of hearts and valentines to add a spokesman for romance and the gentler instincts to our national roster?

A TRIBUTE TO FORMER SENATOR JACOB JAVITS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is with deep sorrow that I rise to speak about the passing of a friend and truly remarkable man, Senator Jacob Javits.

There are many, many individuals who follow standards; there are very few who set them. Jack Javits was a man who set them.

Rising from poverty to become one of the most powerful and influential men in America, Jack Javits proved that with hard work and courage, anything is possible in this great country. His wisdom was sought by Presidents and world leaders. Indeed, his counsel was sought by all who served with him—Republicans and Democrats—in the Senate.

Senator Javits was a master at his trade. His debate skills are well remembered by those of us who sat in this Chamber and heard him fight for and defend legislation. He was a tireless lawmaker whose influence and expertise ran the gamut from social policy and foreign affairs to banking and pension reform.

He was a kind and gentle man who possessed a great intellect and understanding of his fellow man and this institution.

While he was a Senator from New York, serious students of the Senate time and again called Jacob Javits the most competent Member of this body. He will always be remembered in that way.

MAXINE SNOWDEN: ANOTHER SENATE "FIRST"

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, in addition to broadcasting our proceedings to the public, today we had occasion to observe another "first" in Senate history. The Secretary of the Senate's appointment of Maxine Snowden, formerly an assistant legislative clerk with the House of Representatives, as the Senate's assistant enrolling clerk, represents the first time that a woman has held this position. And Maxine's transmittal of House Joint Resolution 345 today at 3 is the first time that a woman has transmitted a message into that Chamber.

History continues to be made in this institution. We congratulate Maxine on carving out her niche in Senate "firsts" and hope she finds this side of the Capitol equally rewarding.

THE CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY LABOR LAW AMENDMENTS

Mr. KENNEDY. I was pleased yesterday to join with Senator D'AMATO and other Senators from both sides of the aisle in introducing S. 2181, the construction industry labor law amendments. This legislation is a long overdue correction of our labor law to end a practice which has drained the vitality from the special construction industry amendments added in 1959 to the National Labor Relations Act.

The construction industry is a unique one, and our labor statutes have made some attempts to fit the proverbial square peg in a round hole. Characterized by constantly shifting worksites, continually changing manpower requirements, and a large and frequently mobile work force, the construction industry requires special attention to accommodate its unique characteristics, and special attempts to provide for stability and security in so vital an industry.

Recent decisions of the National Labor Relations Board have negated the special construction provisions of the 1959 amendments, and today many employers successfully avoid lawful collective-bargaining agreements by playing corporate shell games.

S. 2181 will close this loophole in the law, a loophole spawned by erroneous NLRB interpretation of the act and the objectives Congress sought to achieve in this unique industry in 1959.

I commend Senator D'AMATO for introducing this long overdue correction to our labor law in the construction industry.

DEATH OF SENATOR JACOB JAVITS

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, last week the Senate lost one of the most illustrious members ever to serve in this body—Senator Jacob Javits. In Senator Javits' words, the Senate was his first love. He loved this institution, respected its traditions and, through hard work and deep commitment, elevated public service to a level against which all who follow will be measured.

While I only had the privilege of serving with Senator Javits for 4 years, I felt his presence long before arriving in the Senate in 1977, and have felt his legacy since his departure in January 1981. Senator Javits' intellect was legendary; the depth and breadth of his knowledge on a broad range of issues, from foreign policy to civil rights, was unparalled; and his deep dedication to the causes to which he committed his life and energies brought him the admiration and respect of his colleagues. Senator Javits was not feared, rather he was revered. Senator Javits was not selfish, he was selfless. Senator Javits was not complacent, he was compassionate. Oftentimes, he was a voice in the wilderness, but when Jake Javits spoke, we paid attention. We knew that the issues Jake Javits relentlessly and resolutely pursued were morally right. We listened, because we knew that nothing Jake Javits did was for short term political gain. In many ways, he was our conscience. We listened to Jake Javits and wrestled with our own consciences on the merits of the issues he espoused with such passion.

Senator Javits represented the State of New York for 24 years—longer than any other Senator from that great State. Senator Javits was a Republican from a State with a long Democratic tradition. Yet he was elected and reelected, not only because he represented his State well, but because his constituents respected his judgments as did his colleagues.

Senator Javits never strayed far, either emotionally or spiritually, from the New York tenement in which he was raised. His great compassion for the poor and disadvantaged of our society was born out of personal experience. Despite the heights he achieved, he never forgot his roots.

As much as any other Member who ever served in this body, Senator Javits was responsible for changing the course of our thought and our actions with regard to programs for the poor, the disabled, the disadvantaged, and those who were the victims of discrimination. And he did so without ever holding a committee chairmanship. He persuaded the majority of his colleagues of the rightness of his causes, not through intimidation or strident political rhetoric, but through quiet reason.

It is ironic that after leaving the Senate, Senator Javits succumbed to a debilitating disease. Confined to a wheelchair, and barely able to speak, Jake Javits continued to champion the causes to which he had dedicated his life in the Senate. Fortunately, to the end, he maintained his keen intellect and indomitable spirit. His life was a glorious example of the heights to which the human spirit can rise.

I would like to express my sincere condolences to Senator Javits' wife and his family. A great American statesman has died. All of us who had the good fortune to know and serve with him are richer for that experience.

THE PASSING OF SENATOR JACOB JAVITS

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I would like to say a few words to commemorate the passing last Friday of Jacob Javits, a former Member of this body, a man for whom I had enormous respect and affection.

I have often said about the day I took office as a U.S. Senator that amidst the pride and joy of that day a tinge of sourness in my heart was caused by the realization that I would not be serving with Jack Javits, he would not be my chairman at the Foreign Relations Committee. That coverted dream had eluded him, as he himself wrote later in his autobiography: "I was shown the promised land but was not permitted to enter it."

Even though this last honor was destined to avoid him, Jack Javits was one of the greatest lawyer statesmen our country ever produced. He became a dominant influence on our foreign policy without ever being elected President or serving as Secretary of State. He made his mark as a Member of the Senate and its Committee on Foreign Relations.

His Senate career epitomized a profound respect for the Constitution and for those basic values that are the essence of that document and that are shared by all Americans. He recognized the transcedent nature of American values and did his best to promote foreign policy ideas that were deeply rooted in those values. As he himself wrote in one of his books:

> * * * the fundamental values for which this Nation stands . . . are not merely American values but values distilled from man's long, harrowing experience in trying to bring truth and good beauty into human existence. I believe these values will endure.

Jack Javits had a leading role in authoring the war powers resolution because he wanted to prevent Presidential wars that, lacking popular support, might tear the fabric of the Nation apart.

He was instrumental in formulating our foreign aid policy that is the mainfestation of the charitable instincts of the American people and, at the same time, an excellent tool of promoting democracy and liberty abroad.

Jack Javits was as painfully aware of the shortcomings of the United Nations system as anyone but as a legislator of vision and wisdom he recognized its importance as an institution that was founded on American ideas and as a forum for the promotion of those ideas.

I would not do justice to the splendid achievements of this "Senate man"—a typical self-characterization—if I did not mention his rich record in labor, civil rights, and social legislation. Small in stature but a giant in accomplishments he continued to work and teach even after leaving public life. More and more incapacitated by a crippling and incurable disease he set an example of how to face such enormous adversity with good cheer and courage and continue to live a busy and productive life until death.

I saw him last at the dedication of the archives of his papers at the Stony Brook campus of the State University of New York. He was thrilled at the idea of having the record of his life's work continue to serve students and scholars. He has now left us, but his rich life and example will continue to inspire and teach many further generations.

"WHAT WORKS"

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, King Solomon was not completely correct. I am pleased to note that there is something new on the horizon. What's new is a little pamphlet entitled "What Works."

Over the years, millions of taxpayers' dollars have been spent on research to determine how and why children learn various subjects and how that learning can be improved. Much of that research has contributed to our understanding of the education process. This new publication is a compilation of the more worthwhile research projects presented in a commonsense, no jargon format for use by parents, teachers, and other members of the education community.

On Tuesday, March 4, 1986, the Secretary of Education, Dr. William Bennett, and President Reagan issued this fascinating report. This publication is an obvious complement to the highly acclaimed "Nation at Risk" report which raised serious questions about problems facing our schools as a result of the experiments of the 1960's and 1970's. "What Works" answers many parents' questions about how they can participate in the excellence in education movement on behalf of their children.

In this regard, it is interesting to note one of the report's conclusions; namely, that parents can do many things to perfect their children's education at home. What parents do to help their children learn is more important to their academic success than the economic condition of the family. In short, all American children are educable.

I hope that this and the other findings contained in "What Works" will encourage greater parental involvement in their children's education. This will help ensure that the pursuit of excellence in education is maintained. I applaud Secretary Bennett and Assistant Secretary Chester E. Finn, Jr., for their work on this project and for our Nation's new rededication to improving the quality of America's education system.

CESSNA AND ITS CHAIRMAN RUSS MEYER WIN 1985 ROBERT J. COLLIER TROPHY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise today to honor the Cessna Aircraft Co., of Wichita, KS, and its distinguished chairman, Russell W. Meyer, Jr. Both have been named as the 1985 recipients of the Robert J. Collier Trophy, one of the most prestigious awards for the field of aviation. The Collier Trophy is presented annually by the National Aeronautical Association to an individual or company for the greatest achievement in aeronautics or astronautics in the United States with respect to improving the performance, efficiency, or safety of air or space vehicles.

Cessna and Russ Meyer were nominated for the impressive 1985 safety record of the Cessna Citation business jet aircraft. With a worldwide fleet of nearly 1,400, the Citation aircraft logged almost 750,000 flight hours in 40 countries without a single passenger fatality for the second consecutive year.

In the 14 years and 3.5 million flight hours since the Citation was introduced, only four Citation accidents involving passenger fatalities have occurred in the United States. Worldwide, the Citation fleet logs more than 2,000 flying hours per day, or the equivalent of 33 trips around the world.

That is quite a record. With the Nation becoming increasingly aware of aviation safety, Russ Meyer and the entire Cessna family can be truly proud of the Citation's record.

This award has special significance for Cessna and Russ Meyer because they are the first general aviation recipients in over 70 years since the initial Collier Trophy was awarded to Glenn Curtiss. The names of Cessna and Russ Meyer will be inscribed on the trophy which is on permanent display in the Smithsonian's National Air and Space Museum. They join such distinguished former recipients as: Orville Wright, Chuck Yeager, the crew of Apollo II, and the Senate's own John Glenn.

I am especially pleased that an outstanding Kansas company received this prestigious award. The Citation is a tremendous aircraft and everyone associated with it—employees, customers, and suppliers—should be proud of its unparalleled safety record.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-593. Concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of South Carolina; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

"A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

"Whereas, ending the starvation in Africa requires thirty million tons a year of cereal and animal and vegetable protein foods from outside the continent for three years; and

"Whereas, worldwide food supplies per capita are shrinking dangerously and annual world grain production has declined from eighteen bushels per capita to fifteen bushels per capita when every person needs the equivalent of twenty-four bushels per person per year for a healthy diet, including animal protein; and

"Whereas, the agricultural output potential of the developing sector nations is being destroyed through the International Monetary Fund system; and

"Whereas, a small number of world food cartels and private family trusts have consolidated monopoly control over international food, trade, and shipping facilities, domestic food processing, and farm supply companies, and this poses a threat to national and western security because agreements have been made to guarantee Soviet food stocks resulting in food scarcities in the west; and

"Whereas, the potential agricultural production of the globe is enormous if emergency measures are implemented immediately and provision is begun for applying a wave of advanced technologies to developing largescale infrastructure projects such as dams, irrigation systems, ports and to providing cheap, plentiful power. Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring:

That the members of the General Assembly of South Carolina hereby memorialize the President and the Congress of the United States:

"1. To ensure emergency food production orders to guarantee resumed livestock development and spring planting, including government-to-government food commodity trade commitments to guarantee cost-of-production parity prices to farmers in all trading partner nations.

"2. To institute investigations and antitrust proceedings against the food, shipping, and chemical cartel companies starting with conflict-of-interest hearings on the role of former cartel executives who occupy positions within the United States Department of Agriculture;

"3. To conduct a national grain and food inventory to produce an accurate public record of national food stocks and total western food supplies, and to set production objectives like the World War II mobilization; and

"4. To provide emergency food to Africa and all other points of need and to supply the logistics and infrastructural assistance needed to allow the most rapid economic development.

"Be it further resolved that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the United States Senate, the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of the South Carolina Congressional Delegation."

POM-594. Concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Michigan; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 574.

"A concurrent resolution memorializing the United States Congress to form a task force in order to provide a liaison between the federal government and the states relative to reduction of the dangerously high water levels of the Great Lakes.

"Whereas, Amid the recent controversy stemming from a report issued by the United States Army Corps of Engineers, there has been considerable concern generated for the plight of people and properly directly affected by water levels of the Great Lakes. The waters of the lakes and connecting waterways have been, in general, rising over the past few years. This year, especially during spring rains, elevations are predicted to reach record high levels; and

"Whereas, Experts feel the disastrous effects of extensive flooding, including loss of life and property sure to be a result of the predicted high water levels, can be drastically reduced, if not eliminated, through the careful regulation of still-water elevations. This could be accomplished by safe utilization of existing control points on the Great Lakes; and

"Whereas, Specifically, it is felt that usage of six major control gates, including the Chicago Diversion, the Ogoki and Long Lake Diversions, the Welland Canal, the Black Lock Shipping Canal, the New York State Barge Canal, and the control locks at Sault Ste. Marie could responsibly bring waters to below-crises levels. Originally constructed for diverse purposes, many of these existing control gates fall under differing jurisdictions. A liaison between the governing jurisdictions would greatly facilitate the apportionment and balance of water levels in the Great Lakes, contributing to the safety and benefit of countless United States and Canadian citizens; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the United States Congress be hereby memorialized to form a task force in order to provide a liaison between the federal government and the states relative to reduction of the hazardous high water levels of the Great Lakes; and be it further

"Resolved That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and the members of the Michigan congressional delegation."

POM-595. Concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Alaska; to the Committee on Finance:

"CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Alaska:

"Whereas the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program is an integral part of the social programs of the United States and critical to the health and welfare of the children who live in poverty in the United States; and

"Whereas Alaska supports a system of quality control of the AFDC program if the system is equitable and cost-effective, review is timely, fiscal sanctions are reasonable, and incentives are included; and

"Whereas the quality control programs instituted by the states and territories of the United States and monitored by the federal government have reduced the national rate of error on the payment of AFDC benefits by one-half during the last decade; and

"Whereas experience with the quality control program for AFDC shows that many errors are based on errors in paperwork or on client errors that the states and territories cannot control and that are not necessarily related to misspent funds; and

"Whereas the states and territories of the United States are facing 1.3 billion dollars in fiscal sanctions for exceeding federally determined error tolerance levels; and

"Whereas the states and territories of the United States are faced with the necessity of either reducing the administration of their social programs and thereby risking higher rates of error, or reducing benefits to clients to compensate for the fiscal sanctions imposed by the federal government; and

"Whereas all programs for low income people, including the food stamp and Medicaid programs, are inextricably linked to each other, and reductions or changes in one program affect the benefits available in other programs; and

"Whereas all federal programs for low income persons have separate quality control and fiscal sanction components, thereby amassing billions of dollars in potential fiscal sanctions for the states and territories of the United States;

"Be it resolved by the Alaska State Legislature that the United States Congress is respectfully urged to support the passage of legislation that incorporates the substance of the AFDC Error Reduction and Quality Control Act (H.R. 1279, 99th Congress), amended to cover the Food Stamp and Medicaid Programs as well as the AFDC program; and be it

"Further resolved that this legislation should require that

"(1) the United States Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS) shall disregard errors that have no fiscal impact when determining error rates;

"(2) there shall be established a national error rate that is four percent for the AFDC and Medicaid programs and five percent for the food stamp program, and that allows a higher error rate on a state-by-state or territory-by-territory basis under appropriate conditions;

"(3) DHHS shall provide positive financial incentives to states and territories with error rates less than the national error rates in the form of enhanced federal funding for the administrative costs of the AFDC, Medicaid and food stamp programs; and

"(4) DHHS shall waive all or part of the fiscal sanctions if the secretary of the DHHS determines that a noncomplying state or territory has made a good faith effort to comply but has experienced circumstances beyond its control that make it impossible for the state or territory to comply."

POM-596. Concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Michigan; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 573

"A concurrent resolution memorializing the United States Congress to urge the International Joint Commission to study the Great Lakes water system in regard to possible long-term solutions concerning dangerous high water levels.

"Whereas, Rain and snowfall in the Great Lakes basin last year exceeded the annual average, causing much concern over the high water level of the individual Great Lakes. Recent reports show the lakes to be at their highest level in several years, with water rising by at least nine inches during the past year. This will lead to disastrous flooding this spring and much loss to shorelines, personal property, and public docks and beaches. Officials are also warning of health and pollution concerns as sewer systems become flooded; and

"Whereas, One answer to the dilemma of record high water levels is better management of water intake and outflow. Specifically, regulation of the Niagara River Channel would help to control the dangerously high water level of Lake Erie. Such a project is also justified by economic by-products, including hydroelectric power. Careful usage of other already existing water diversion points or construction of new efforts should also be investigated; and

"Whereas, The International Joint Commission (IJC), a United States-Canadian agency that sets Great Lakes water policy, reviews Great Lakes regulation and examines proposals in regard to the lakes, weighing both advantages and disadvantages with an international perspective. We urge the IJC to reopen previous studies concerning efficient water capacity on the Great Lakes and to undertake new studies exploring the feasibility of organizing a central management entity to oversee the administrative operations of such an endeavor; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That we hereby memorialize the United States Congress to urge the International Joint Commission to study the Great Lakes water system in regard to all possible long-term solutions regarding dangerous high water levels; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the members of the Michigan congressional delegation, and officials of the International Joint Commission."

"A JOINT RESOLUTION

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota, the House of Representatives concurring therein:

"Be it further resolved, that this application and request be deemed null and void, rescinded, and of no effect in the event that such convention not be limited to such specific and exclusive purpose; and

"Be it further resolved, that this application by this Legislature constitutes a continuing application in accordance with Article V of the Constitution of the United States until at least two-thirds of the legislatures of the several states have made applications for similar relief pursuant to Article V, but, if Congress proposes an amendment to the Constitution identical in subject matter to that contained in this Joint Resolution then this petition for a Constitutional Convention shall no longer be of any force or effect; and

"Be it further resolved, that this Legislature also proposes that the legislatures of each of the several states comprising the United States apply to the Congress requesting the enactment of an appropriate amendment to the Federal Constitution, or requiring the Congress to call a constitutional convention for proposing such an amendment to the Federal Constitution; and

"Be it further resolved, that copies of this Joint Resolution be sent by the Secretary of State to each member of the South Dakota Congressional Delegation; and

"Whereas, It is important that parents be informed about diseases and vaccines against these diseases, it is equally important that parents be informed about adverse reactions to vaccines so that "high risk children" can be identified and screened out of the vaccination process; and, be it

"Resolved by the Senate, That the passage of the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Compensation Act, US Senate Bill No. 827, which would require the United States Department of Health and Human Services to promote the development of safer vaccines, and impose stronger standards of care and mandates for vaccine testing, warning, labeling, quality control, field surveillance, etc.; provide both doctors and parents with information necessary to elicit and give genuine informed consent; require reporting, recording, and long-term follow up of major vaccine reactions to aid in screening out children at risk; preserve parents' unfettered access to the tort system (both to permit parents to choose the legal care most appropriate for their injured child and to retain the tort system's deterrent incentives against negligence in the manufacture and administration of mandated vaccines); offer an expeditious, non-adversarial, unbiased and adequate compensation alternative to the tort system for those parents who elect it; and provide emergency stand-by authority for Health and Human Services to assure adequate supplies of childhood vaccines if private insurance genuinely becomes unavailable to vaccine makers; is hereby supported as introduced, without amendments to weaken the bill; and, be it

"Whereas, American former prisoners of war have often been unable to qualify for federal veterans' benefits available to former military personnel because of the absence of medical records and documentary evidence of their mistreatment; and

"Whereas, legislation now before the Congress would go a long way toward making it easier for these former prisoners of war to qualify for these benefits; and

"Whereas, this legislation has been endorsed not only by many Virginia veterans' organizations but also by the Virginia Commission on Veterans' Affairs; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Senate, the House of Delegates concurring, That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized to pass legislation now before it (H.R. 864 and S. 1446) to aid American former prisoners of war in obtaining the veterans' benefits which they so very richly deserve; and, be it

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. METZENBAUM (for himself and Mr. HOLLINGS):

S. 2183. A bill to improve services for individuals with Alzheimer's disease and their families; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

ALZHEIMER'S DISEASE RESEARCH AND ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, on November 6, 1985, I introduced S. 1835, "The Alzheimer's Disease Demonstration, Research, Respite, and Assistance Act of 1985," comprehensive legislation to strengthen and to make more coherent our national response to a disease that afflicts 2.5 million to 3 million Americans and kills 150,000 every year. The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance, then referred for executive comment to the Office of Management and Budget, the Treasury Department, and the Department of Health and Human Services.

S. 1835 which is cosponsored by Sen. HOLLINGS, addresses the range of needs experienced by Alzheimer's victims and their families. It deals with a wide range of needs, programs, services and agencies through a coordinated approach. The National Alzheimer's Disease and Related Disorders Association, representing families across the country, enthusiastically supports the bill. It is my hope that the Committee on Finance will report it favorably.

However, to facilitate the legislative process, I am today introducing a new version of S. 1835, "The Alzheimer's Disease Research and Assistance Act of 1986." This bill is similar to the original—except that the provisions dealing with tax policy, Medicare, small business loans, and the Veterans' Administration have been deleted. The remaining provisions all address issues under the jurisdiction of the Labor and Human Resources Committee. I will seek an early hearing before that panel.

Ultimately, I continue to believe that all of S. 1835 should be enacted to assure a comprehensive Federal program on Alzheimer's disease. By moving to quick hearings in the Labor and Human Resources Committee, I believe the bill I am introducing today will hasten that outcome.

As the population ages, it becomes ever more incumbent upon us to facilitate and expedite the effort to place Alzheimer's disease on the national agenda, to find solutions for Alzheimer's disease, and to plan for acute catastrophic health care and long-term care.

I would like to submit my statement of November 6, 1985, for the RECORD once again. And I request that the new bill, "The Alzheimer's Disease Research and Assistance Act of 1986," be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2183

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This Act may be cited as the "Alzheimer's Disease Research and Assistance Act of 1986".

By Mr. METZENBAUM:

S. 1835. A bill to provide assistance in alleviating the suffering of victims of Alzheimer's disease and their families; to the Committee on Finance.

ALZHEIMER'S DISEASE DEMONSTRATION, RESEARCH, RESPITE, AND ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am today introducing the Alzheimer's Disease Demonstration, Research, Respite, and Assistance Act, legislation designed to strengthen and to make more coherent our national response to Alzheimer's disease, an affliction that has devasted the lives of millions of Americans.

Alzheimer's disease, Mr. President, is a neurological disorder that, before killing its victims, renders them incapable of caring for themselves.

How widespread is it?

Approximately 2.5 to 3 million Americans suffer today from Alzheimer's.

According to the Public Health Service, this terrible disease strikes 1 of every 20 people between the ages of 65 and 75. And beyond the age of 80, it afflicts one person in every five. But it has been known to strike people in their thirties, too, and people at the peak of their careers and contributions to society.

Alzheimer's is a deadly disease—the fourth leading killer of adults in this country. Each year, 150,000 Americans die from this disorder and related complications.

But these are only numbers, Mr. President. And numbers cannot begin to convey the tragedy of Alzheimer's—the tragedy for those who contract this affliction, and for their families, who must not only watch the mental and physical disintegration of a loved one, but in many cases, provide the round-the-clock care to the victim.

Mr. President, in the past few years, several Members of the House and the Senate, myself included, have sponsored a variety of efforts to address one or another facet of Alzheimer's disease. And from these efforts, we have learned that, to deal with the very broad impact of Alzheimer's requires bringing together in a coordinated manner a wide, wide range of programs and services.

The legislation I am introducing today will establish basic guideposts in order to promote a coordinated program.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL

Two years ago, the Secretary of HHS established an interagency task force to help coordinate Government efforts pertaining to Alzheimer's disease. The task force has served in many ways as a catalyst for agency programs and activities.

The legislation I am introducing today would take the task force concept a step further, by establishing in statute for a period of 6 years, an advisory council that would report to the President and the Congress.

This advisory council would be composed of representatives from Government, the research and medical communities, health care providers, researchers, and representatives of families whose members have been stricken with Alzheimer's. One of the council's primary functions would be to help develop, encourage, and guide research on Alzheimer's disease. But beyond that, the council would serve as a "switching station"—a mechanism for conveying new information and ideas to physicians, nurses, care givers, and family members.

RESEARCH, STATISTICS, AND INFORMATION EXCHANGE

To begin with, this legislation would underscore the critical need for both basic and clinical research on Alzheimer's disease. It would promote research partnerships between Government agencies such as the National Institutes of Health and the Veterans' Administration and, at the same time, encourage collaborative efforts among Government agencies, university research centers, pharmaceutical houses, and others throughout the medical and scientific community. And it would establish five additional research centers.

I hasten to add that while medical research offers the only real hope for finding a cure, we cannot overlook the desperate needs of those who are already struggling to cope with the day-to-day ravages of this disease. For that reason, the legislation I am introducing would also encourage long-overdue research and demonstration on delivering health services.

The legislation would designate the National Institute on Aging as the agency responsible for collecting and disseminating information on Alzheimer's disease.

DEVELOPMENT AND COORDINATION OF SERVICES

Approaches that may be helpful to Alzheimer's patients are often beyond the reach of too many people, owing to a lack of income, and absence of community resources, and shortages of trained personnel.

Rather than establish a whole new system of community-based services, this legislation would make use of mechanisms already in place throughout the country. The administration on aging's extensive network of State and area agencies, the VA's medical and nursing facilities, and the family support systems of national voluntary organizations, such as the Alzheimer's Disease and Related Disorders Association, would all be utilized in a coordinated way to assist victims and their families. The legislation provides also for low-cost loans to those private individuals who will establish day care centers for Alzheimer's families.

Among other things, the National Institute on Aging and the National Institute on Mental Health with the advice of the National Advisory Council would be assigned responsibility for designing and implementing training programs for those professionals whose job it is to care for victims of the disease.

LONG-TERM CARE STRATEGIES

Mr. President, since the turn of this century our Nation has made tremendous strides in the fields of health and medical science. New drugs, new technologies, and improved procedures have all helped to raise the health standards of our citizens.

Still, our system of social protections—particularly for the elderly—is not reaching all of the target population. In the case of Alzheimer's patients, families most often bear the full burden of care with little help from others. Medicare does not cover the long-term costs of caring for victims, nor do most private insurance plans. For that matter, few local communities are either able or willing to assume at least a part of the responsibility for care.

Under the legislation I am introducing today, there would be tax relief for the short term, but for the longer term, the appropriate Government agencies such as the Health Care Financing Administration, would, with the assistance of the National Council, assume responsibility for developing systems to provide long-term care and alternative financing mechanisms specifically for victims of Alzheimer's disease and related disorders. An advisory subpanel of the National Council would work with HCFA, providing recommendations and expertise.

In order to encourage new and innovative approaches to care, the Secretary of HHS is directed to authorize Medicare waivers for home health care and other support services. The Secretary will also promulgate regulations to prohibit discrimination against Alzheimer's patients who are eligible for Medicaid assistance.

At the same time, the National Institute on Aging and the National Center for Health Statistics are directed by the legislation to collect, maintain and provide for the exchange of medical information and the development of a national data base on Alzheimer's disease.

UNIFORM VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION POLICY

It is not easy to believe, Mr. President, but it is a fact that the Veterans' Administration currently has no consistent policy with respect to veterans with Alzheimer's disease. As a consequence, some victims of the disease are admitted to VA medical facilities, while others are either denied admission or are referred to State-run or private facilities.

The legislation I am proposing today will address this problem by requiring the VA to set fair and consistent guidelines regarding veterans with Alzheimer's disease. As part of that effort, VA facilities will be required to provide at least minimum services, including assessment and diagnosis, counseling, and tracking for veterans over age 55 who suffer from Alzheimer's disease. The VA is also required to develop a limited number of high quality demonstration projects in order to explore the most effective means of providing care outside of institutional settings. Such services would include adult day care, respite care, hospital-based home care, and home intervention teams.

SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY BENEFITS

Yet another problem confronting most victims of Alzheimer's disease pertains to the Federal Disability Insurance Program.

Currently, the statutes authorizing disability benefits do not preclude benefit payments to individuals suffering from Alzheimer's disease. Nevertheless, the guidelines used by State examiners to evaluate benefit claims are rather vague when it comes to this ailment. This, in turn, has led to what can only be described as unfair treatment of those who have a rightful claim to benefits.

This legislation charges the National Advisory Council with responsibility for channeling the most current scientific and medical information to the Social Security Administration. The information will then be used to update Social Security guidelines on the Disability Program, as well as on supplemental security income [SSI]. And, in addition to putting the latest information in the hands of those who need it most—the claims examiners—the Social Security Administration will be required, periodically, to train and retrain examiners.

TAX-RELATED PROVISIONS

In addition, this legislation will extend tax relief to families. First, it increases the dependent adult day care tax credit allowed while caring for a victim at home. Second, it provides a deduction for dependent adult home health care services and equipment. And finally, it allows a tax deduction for nursing home care prescribed by specified health professionals.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING

Finally, this legislation provides for the development and dissemination of curricula on Alzheimer's disease and for the training of various care givers, including clinical care providers, patient families, home health aides, nursing home personnel, and safety and transportation personnel. This month is national Alzheimer's Disease Awareness Month, and we must continue to raise public awareness to the tragic need to provide assistance for its victims and to move toward its elimination. Mr. President, the intent of this legislation is to promote a coordinated and compassionate approach to the problem of Alzheimer's disease. I hope that we will be able to act expeditiously on this legislation, and ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2184. A bill to authorize appropriations to the National Science Foundation for the fiscal year 1987, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEAR 1987

Mr. HATCH. Mr President, I am pleased to introduce legislation which authorizes the programs of the National Science Foundation for fiscal year 1987. The fact that the Reagan administration has submitted a request for over $1.6 billion in funding for the NSF, an increase of 8.4 percent before Gramm-Rudman-Hollings reductions, is indicative of how important basic research is to our future.

Last year, the Labor and Human Resources Committee teamed up with our colleagues on the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee and the House Science and Technology Committee to enact the first regular NSF authorization measure in 5 years. I hope we can work together again to pass this bill in an expeditious manner, and in so doing, provide some clear direction and stability of congressional intent.

Mr. President, for the convenience of all Senators and organizations which follow this legislation, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2184

S. 2185. A bill to extend the term of the Cape Cod National Seashore Advisory Commission; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EXTENSION OF THE TERM OF THE CAPE COD NATIONAL SEASHORE ADVISORY COMMISSION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today, I, along with my colleague Senator KERRY, am pleased to introduce a bill to authorize the charter of the Cape Cod National Seashore Advisory Commission until 1997. This bill will complement the legislation introduced last week in the House by Congressman STUDDS.

In 1961, the Cape Cod National Seashore was established to preserve its natural beauty and enable the citizens from across our country to enjoy the spacious beaches, wildlife and forested areas. The legislation also created the Cape Cod Advisory Commission, composed of representatives from the communities abutting the seashore, as well as from the county, State and Federal Governments. Since its inception 24 years ago, the Cape Cod National Seashore Advisory Commission has provided valuable input into major decisions concerning the use and management of the Cape Cod National Seashore. The people of Massachusetts and across our Nation have derived significant benefits from the work of the Commission, which has served to bridge the gap between competing interests at the national seashore. The Commission's work has been held in high esteem and is deeply respected by the National Park Service, local officials and the residents of Cape Cod.

Every year, millions of visitors from across our Nation have flocked to enjoy the seashore. These visitors have a direct impact, not only on the seashore, but the neighboring communities. Unlike other national parks, the beautiful lands on the Cape Cod National Seashore are owned not only by the Federal Government, but the local communities and private individuals. These facts underlie the importance of having a Commission which will provide recommendations to the National Park Service on decisions affecting the entire area.

The work of the Cape Cod National Seashore Advisory Commission began in 1962 when President John F. Kennedy, recognizing the value of the seashore and the importance of establishing a citizen advisory board, stated, "If we had not seized by national decision, the Cape Cod National Park * * * [it] would have been gone forever * * * I urge therefore that the talented and able people of this State make the judgments on recreation and conservation and wise use of our resources now with a long look forward, not for this decade but for the next generation."

This legislation will ensure that the Cape Code National Seashore Advisory Commission, which has worked diligently to represent the Cape Cod communities and to preserve the natural beauty of the Cape Cod National Park, will continue to serve the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the Nation.

By Mr. MURKOWSKI (for himself, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. DENTON, Mr. ABDNOR, and Mrs. HAWKINS):

S. 2186. A bill to exempt any amounts available to provide certain benefits to veterans with service-connected disabilities from any requirement for sequestration of funds under part C of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EXEMPTING VETERANS BENEFITS FROM SEQUESTRATION ORDERS

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I rise today in support of S. 2186, which I introduce along with Senators THURMOND, SPECTER, DENTON, ABDNOR, and HAWKINS, who are original cosponsors. This bill is intended to exempt from any future requirement for sequestration of funds pursuant to Public Law 99-177, the "Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985," amounts available to provide certain benefits or assistance to veterans with service-connected disabilities.

The Veterans' Administration programs to be exempted by this legislation from any future reductions under a sequester order include: benefits relating to specially adapted housing for disabled veterans; burial benefits for veterans who die as the result of a service-connected disability; assistance for vocational training and rehabilitation for veterans with service-connected disabilities which are rated 50 percent or more by the Veterans' Administration; benefits relating to automobiles and adaptive equipment for certain disabled veterans and members of the Armed Forces; and benefits for service-connected disabled patients which are provided by the special therapeutic and rehabilitation activities fund which supports the compensated work therapy program. The provisions of this bill would apply to any sequestration order issued for a fiscal year after fiscal year 1986.

The final passage of the "Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985" exempted from any sequestration reduction, veterans' compensation and pension programs and provided a measure of protection to VA health care. At that time, many of our colleagues stressed the importance of providing a measure of protection for programs for those veterans for whom the Veterans' Administration was established—the service-connected disabled veterans. The Congress clearly did not intend that programs and benefits for service-connected disabled veterans would be affected by sequestration reductions.

As the Veterans' Administration has gone about the implementation of the first sequestration order issued by the President on February 1, 1986, it has become apparent that some of the benefit programs designed specifically for service-connected disabled veterans, specifically those who have been injured or disabled during active military service to this Nation, have been denied the full benefit of their statutory entitlement because of their non-protected status under the first sequestration order for fiscal year 1986. The Congress did not anticipate this resulting sequestration of programs designed for service-connected disabled veterans. We should act to correct this serious oversight.

It is important to note that the intent of this bill I am introducing today is not to chip away at the basic intent of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation. One of my highest priorities as a Senator and as chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee is to work toward meaningful deficit reduction. I do want to stress the word meaningful. I believe that veterans, as all Americans, must share the responsibility of reducing Federal spending. But, Mr. President, I believe that those veterans who incurred injuries or disabilities as a result of their service to our country must be provided a special measure of protection, especially those with severe disabilities. This legislation would provide an exemption from future sequestrations for the category of severely disabled service-connected veterans.

PROVISIONS OF S. 2186

Mr. President, in fiscal year 1984, 7,250 physically or mentally disabled veterans participated in the VA's Compensated Work Therapy Program. This program provides work rehabilitation in return for monetary compensation for VA patients. The primary purpose of the program is to promote the development of social interaction, mental awareness, and self-esteem of program participants of all ages. The program is funded through a self-sustaining revolving fund: the special therapeutic and rehabilitation activities fund. Fiscal year 1984 receipts were approximately $2.3 million.

This program was inadvertently subject to the fiscal year 1986 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequester order since it was not specifically exempted by the legislation. Because it is a self-sustaining fund and since the program's specific focus is on the rehabilitation of disabled veterans, I believe it is inappropriate to include it in any sequester order. The legislation I am introducing today would exempt from a sequester order, the special therapeutic and rehabilitation activities fund which supports the Compensated Work Therapy Program funding for service-connected veterans.

Also protected from sequestration are the grants made for specially adapted housing. These grants of up to $32,500 are available to veterans whose service-connected disabilities are permanent and total and in addition have resulted in the loss of limbs, or a combination of sight and limbs, so as to require the use of a wheel chair or other prosthetic devices. The veterans who receive these grants are not only service-connected, they are among the most seriously disabled of the service-connected disabled veterans. These grants, which help offset the higher cost of constructing a home adapted to the needs of mobility impaired disabled veterans, are an appropriate addition to the service-connected compensation paid to these veterans.

Because these veterans are seriously disabled, they are often unable to purchase mortgage protection life insurance to insure that their families will have a home if they die. The VA makes mortgage life insurance available to these veterans. The veterans pays the standard premium that a non-disabled individual would pay and the VA pays the additional premium imposed because of the veterans' service-connected disability. This legislation would also protect this mortgage insurance from a sequestration order.

Another program similar to the grant for specially adapted housing is the $5,000 grant for an automobile for veterans whose service-connected disabilities have resulted in the loss or permanent impairment of use of one or both hands or feet or permanent impairment of vision. The VA may then provide the adaptive equipment needed to allow the veteran to make use of the vehicle. For a seriously disabled veteran mobility is a basic need. In our country today mobility generally means a vehicle. We do no favor to veterans who have lost sight or limb while serving our country if we protect the compensation they receive because of their disability but reduce the benefits intended to provide them the mobility they need to have access the society they served.

Mr. President, this legislation would also protect the allowance paid for the burial of veterans who die as a result of a service-connected cause. This $1,100 allowance serves as a last symbol of the value the Nation places on their sacrifice on our behalf.

This legislation would also protect from a sequester order the benefits paid to veterans with a service-connected disability rated 50 percent or more disabling while they are in training using VA vocational rehabilitation. VA pays the tuition and fees of veterans in vocational rehabilitation. In addition, the veteran receives a subsistence allowance. In the implementation of the fiscal year 1986 sequester order the Veterans' Administration reduced the subsistence allowance by over 13 percent. In February 1986 about 6,000 of these seriously disabled veterans were in training. Legislation cannot restore the limbs or ease the pain of these veterans, but the Congress can preserve the effectiveness of the program that provides the training they need to overcome their handicaps in order to function at their maximum capacity. Protecting the disability compensation of these veterans while reducing the vocational rehabilitation that could return them to the mainstream of life and work would be both poor policy and unresponsive to the needs of veterans who are seriously disabled as the result of injuries incurred while they were in the service of the Nation.

In summary, Mr. President, these very important benefits which are designed to aid the most severely disabled service-connected veterans should not be subject to sequestration. The sequester baseline of these five programs for fiscal year 1986 is approximately $140 million and the sequester level is approximately $6 million. Due to the nature of these programs and the long-standing congressional commitment to our Nation's service-connected disabled veterans, I believe that this legislation should be enacted to ensure that this commitment is continued.●

By Mr. DeCONCINI:

S. 2187. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to exempt from sequestration certain benefits for veterans and dependents and survivors of certain veterans which are paid based on the service-connected disability or death of veterans; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EXEMPTION OF VETERANS DISABILITY BENEFITS FROM SEQUESTRATION

Mr. DeCONCINI. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation, S. 2187, to provide an exemption from future sequestration under Gramm-Rudman for certain Veterans' Administration benefits that are paid based on the service-connected disability or death of a veteran. This is the companion to a bipartisan bill being introduced in the House of Representatives today by House Committee on Veterans' Affairs Chairman SONNY MONTGOMERY.

Under the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985—known as "Gramm-Rudman"—the only exemptions for veterans' programs from the across-the-board cuts entailed in Presidential sequestration orders are for compensation paid to service-connected disabled veterans, dependency and indemnity compensation [DIC] paid to the survivors of those who die from service-connected disabilities, and non-service-connected pension paid to needy wartime veterans who are totally disabled or elderly and to needy survivors of wartime veterans. In addition, Gramm-Rudman cuts in spending for health care services are limited to 1 percent in fiscal year 1986 and 2 percent in fiscal years 1987-91.

The exemption for service-connected disability compensation for veterans and DIC for survivors was fully justified as necessary to help ensure—with respect to those benefits—that our Nation keeps its commitments to those who incur disabilities during their military service and to the survivors of those who die from service-connected causes.

However, Mr. President, the exemption provided in the law as enacted does not go far enough in protecting benefits based on service-connected disability or death. Certain small—but extremely important in terms of our obligations to those who served at great personal sacrifice or who gave their lives defending our freedoms—programs were not protected in any way. Thus, the following VA programs are not exempt:

Vocational rehabilitation for service-connected disabled veterans who have employment handicaps; specially adapted housing grants paid to veterans with certain severe service-connected disabilities; adapted automobile and adaptive auto-equipment grants paid to veterans with certain serious service-connected disabilities; burial benefits for those who die from service-connected causes; and educational assistance for the survivors of those who die from service-connected causes and for the dependents of permanently and totally service-connected disabled veterans.

Thus, under the President's fiscal year 1986 sequestration order, those VA benefits were reduced, effective March 1, as follows:

First, the subsistence allowances paid to service-connected disabled veterans with employment handicaps who are enrolled in VA vocational rehabilitation under chapter 31 of title 38, United States Code, were reduced by 13.1 percent.

Second, education assistance allowances paid under chapter 35 of title 38 to the dependents of veterans who are totally disabled due to service-connected disabilities and the survivors of those who die as a result of service-connected disabilities were reduced by 8.7 percent.

Third, specially adapted housing grants paid under chapter 21 of title 38 to veterans with certain permanent and total service-connected disabilities that severely impair their mobility were reduced from $35,000 to $32,600, a cut of 8 percent.

Fourth, grants up to $6,000 paid under the same chapter to provide home adaptations needed by veterans with service-connected blindness or the service-connected loss or loss of use of both upper extremities are being reduced by 8 percent.

Fifth, one-time grants paid under chapter 39 of title 38 to veterans with certain serious service-connected disabilities, for the purchase of specially adapted automobiles were reduced from $5,000 to $4,600, an 8-percent cut.

Sixth, payments to these veterans under the same chapter for automobile adaptive equipment were reduced by 8 percent.

Seventh, burial benefits paid under section 907 of title 38 to the survivors of those who die as the result of service-connected disability were reduced from $1,100 to $1,014, a 7.8-percent cut.

Mr. President, I deeply regret that these reductions have been made, and my bill would ensure that no cuts under Gramm-Rudman will ever again be imposed on these top-priority benefits which serve to help fulfill some of our Nation's most fundamental obligations.

I consider the imposition of these cuts in fiscal year 1986 to be the tragic result of an oversight by Congress in the rush to enact the Gramm-Rudman legislation without benefit of the committee process in either body. Correcting this error for future years—when the percentage reductions could be much greater—would entail no costs at all. My bill would simply remove from any future sequestration pool, without changing the total that would be sequestered, programs for which the total estimated spending will be only $230 million in fiscal year 1987—or only two-tenths of a percent of the nonexempt, nondefense programs that are totally unprotected or only one-tenth of 1-percent of all nonexempt, nondefense programs. Thus, its impact on those other programs under a future sequestration order would be most insignificant.

Mr. President, I urge all of my colleagues to join with me in supporting this legislation of such great importance both to veterans whose valor and sacrifices have kept our Nation free and strong and to their families.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being on objection , the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2187

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S.J. Res. 294. Joint resolution to designate the month of April 1986 as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am introducing today a joint resolution to declare the month of April 1986 as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month." I am pleased to know that a great number of my distinguished colleagues will join me in this important effort.

Mr. President, despite the fact that agencies serving our children have made notable improvements over the past few years, by revamping rules and regulations, pin-pointing issues, disseminating information and increasing public awareness—child abuse is still on the increase.

It is clear from data generated over the past few years that our Nation's poor children are the high-risk subjects for abuse, neglect and other problems associated with poverty. The families of these children are caught in a web of strife, stress and strain in their attempt to just survive from day to day. Their struggle is compounded by the lack of resources, both spiritual and physical, to lighten the burden imposed by their state of poverty.

Mr. President, child abuse is not getting better it's getting worse, for example, recent statistics and reports reveal that, last year alone, over 800,000 youngsters were neglected or deprived of their basic needs and resulting in cases of both physical and or emotional damage to the child. Additionally, over 50,000 children per year suffered a major physical injury at the hands of a child abuser. And according to the American Association for Protecting Children, a division of the American Humane Association, reports of child abuse and neglect are up by 39.8 percent since 1981.

Furthermore, in it's annual report, the children's defense fund states:

Neglect is the most frequently reported type of maltreatment, accounting for 41.7 percent of the reports. Abuse alone accounted for 33.3 percent, and abuse and neglect together accounted for 16.8 percent. Almost always, perpetrators are those with whom the child lives . . . in 86 percent of cases, the child's parent.

Mr. President, indeed, many children in the U.S.A. are growing up in wholesome environments, however, there are millions who are not. These are the children in homes with a multitude of family problems, and the families are not equipped to furnish the children with the basic safety and solace they need to become productive and responsible adults. Every child in the world needs food, clothing, shelter, and nurturing in order to survive and succeed in our society.

As I have stated previously, Members of Congress have an opportunity to assist the many individuals, organizations, and agencies that are striving to rid our Nation of the child abuse problem and to assist the victims as well. We can help focus public attention on the goals and objectives of these agencies and improve the general welfare of our children.

The declaration of April 1986 as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month" is a significant way we can emphasize the importance of increasing public awareness and education for the benefit of our troubled families and suffering children. Therefore, I urge my fellow colleagues to join me in this effort to have April 1986 designated as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 115—OPPOSING FORCED RESETTLEMENT AND OPPRESSION IN ETHIOPIA

Mr. TRIBLE (for himself, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, and Mr. BOSCHWITZ) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 115

Whereas the Ethiopian regime has forcibly resettled hundreds of thousands of people to other parts of that country, resulting in massive human suffering, widespread separation of families, and the deaths of more than 100,000 people;

Whereas many Ethiopians, unable to withstand diseases common to regions to which they have been resettled, have died from such diseases after being moved;

Whereas the Ethiopian government has expropriated food and other humanitarian supplies intended for hunger relief and has used them instead to further its forcible resettlement program and to supply its military;

Whereas one purpose of the forcible resettlement program is to remove from Ethiopia's northern provinces those Ethiopians who are sympathetic to anti-government resistance forces present there;

Whereas many resettlement camps in Ethiopia have been found to be unhealthy and inhumane;

Whereas the French humanitarian organization Medicins Sans Frontiers has been banned from Ethiopia for disclosing the truth about the government's brutal resettlement program;

Whereas there are over 1,700 Soviet and 2,500 Cuban troops and advisors stationed in Ethiopia, and the Ethiopian regime spends billions of dollars to purchase military arms and supplies from the Soviet Union;

Whereas the United States, together with all humanitarian aid donors, remains committed to alleviating the suffering of victims of famine and oppression in Ethiopia: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring).—

SECTION 1. That in the event that the forcible resettlement program continues to be implemented in a manner that causes, directly or indirectly, loss of life among those forcibly resettled, the President is urged to consider—

1. Prohibiting importation of all goods and services from Ethiopia and encouraging all Western nations to do the same;

2. Removing all Generalized System of Preferences privileges from Ethiopia;

3. Stripping Ethiopia of its Most-Favored-Nation trade status;

4. Adding Ethiopia to the list of communist countries contained in Section 620 (f) of the Foreign Assistance Act;

5. Forbidding any United States person, corporation, or foreign affiliate, including any branch of the Government of the United States, from extending any loans or credits to, or making any investment in, the Government of Ethiopia, or any corporation or partnership owned or controlled by the government of Ethiopia;

6. Instructing all United States representatives to international lending institutions to vote against furnishing any assistance by those institutions to the Government of Ethiopia;

SEC. 2. That it is the sense of the Congress that the President should—

1. Immediately call on the United Nations and other donors to closely monitor all resettlement efforts in Ethiopia to ensure that coercion is not used; that families are not separated as a result of being moved; and, that any individuals who voluntarily relocate are healthy enough to undertake and survive the journey;

2. Immediately call upon the Ethiopian government to place an immediate moratorium on any relocation effort whose effect is to cause suffering or death, or whose partial or sole purpose is to remove from certain regions of that country those Ethiopians who are sympathetic to the anti-government rebels;

3. Request that the Government of Ethiopia immediately commit sufficient resources to improve conditions in existing resettlement camps and to alleviate the continuing hunger of thousands of Ethiopians, instead of diverting needed resources to its forcible resettlement program and its military;

4. Insist that international observers and the news media be immediately given free access to all resettlement camps and to all relocation activities in Ethiopia; and

5. Ensure that the United States continues to raise Ethiopia's forcible resettlement program and diversion of resources in every appropriate international forum, including the United Nations.

SEC. 3. For as long as the resettlement and villagization programs are continued, the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs is requested to transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee a report within 30 days, and every 60 days thereafter, indicating the number of Ethiopians he believes or has reason to believe have died as a direct or indirect result of the resettlement program.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of State shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the head of the diplomatic mission of Ethiopia to the United States, to Ethiopia's permanent representative to the United Nations and its specialized agencies, and to all major donor countries and heads of their governments.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 116—CONCERNING THE FAMINE IN ETHIOPIA AND THE GOVERNMENT'S RESETTLEMENT POLICY

Mr. KASTEN (for himself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. GORE, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. EXON, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. RIEGLE) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 116

Whereas a significant hunger crisis continues to threaten thousands of lives in Ethiopia, despite the concentrated efforts of Western donors;

Whereas the American people, along with the worldwide humanitarian community, find the suffering in Africa due to famine an enormous tragedy and seek ways to relieve the sickness and hardship of starvation victims;

Whereas the aid contributed by Western donors is given in good faith, with the understanding that it will reach the actual victims of the famine;

Whereas the United States Government monitors the distribution by private and voluntary organizations of American-donated food through the Agency for International Development;

Whereas the United Nations, through its Office of Emergency Operations in Africa, oversees and helps direct the efforts of donor countries;

Whereas the Ethiopian Government has engaged in a program of resettlement designed to move significant numbers of people from some areas of the country to resettle them in other areas;

Whereas the Ethiopian Government has stated that resettlement should be voluntary, that it should not separate family members, and that it should be conducted without causing undue suffering of the participants;

Whereas reputable international voluntary agencies have alleged that the Ethiopian Government has used coercive force in this resettlement;

Whereas allegations have been made that the Ethiopian Government misused non-United States food assistance as part of its resettlement program;

Whereas allegations have been made regarding inhumane conditions prevailing in many resettlement camps;

Whereas Ethiopian authorities have not met their commitment to international donors to distribute 2,500 metric tons of food and relief goods per day from the port of Assab;

Whereas all resources are needed to deal with the continuing hunger crisis and should not be diverted to resettlement efforts; and

Whereas the United States, the United Nations, and all other donors seek the cooperation of the Ethiopian Government in aiding the vast number of Ethiopians who are victims of the current famine: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the United States, in cooperation with other members of the international donor community, should call upon the Ethiopian Government to recognize that resources donated for famine relief should be used for that purpose and not diverted to resettlement efforts or other purposes:

(2) the Ethiopian Government should give its strongest consideration to suspending its resettlement program for the duration of the drought so that all available resources can be focused on famine needs and so that, during its announced consolidation period, the Ethiopian Government can make progress toward improvement of conditions of the settlements already in place;

(3) the international donor community should jointly call for a halt to all forced resettlements by the Ethiopian Government, just as the Congress hereby calls for the end of coercive resettlement activities;

(4) the United Nations, through its Special Representative in Ethiopa, should monitor any resettlement effort so that coercion is not used and there is total freedom to move into or out of any resettlement camp;

(5) the United Nations, through its Special Representative in Ethiopia, should insist that the Ethiopian Government provide free access to all resettlement sites for all international observers and the news media;

(6) the United Nations, through its Office of Emergency Operations in Africa, should immediately report on the conditions in the resettlement camps; and

(7) the Ethiopian Government should commit sufficient resources to move donated food and relief goods from the port of Assab to distribution centers so that the minimum rate of 2,500 metric tons per day necessary to meet the needs of its people is maintained.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, on February 26, Senators HATFIELD, INOUYE, and I sent a letter to our colleagues inviting cosponsorship of a resolution pertaining to the forced resettlement program of the Government of Ethiopia.

Since we sent that letter, there have been additional reports on the extraordinary hardship and deaths being caused by this program. Private organizations, independent observers, and administration officials continue to report numerous instances of inhumane conditions in the resettlement of Ethiopians, including gross overcrowding in unpressurized airplanes; inadequate medical facilities, food, water, and shelter, both in transit and at the resettlement camps. Rates of death at these locations are reported to be extraordinarily high, with disease rampant. Those resettled are often taken against their will, and held under constant guard to prevent escape, and many are separated from their families. An article in the Washington Post on Monday, March 10, detailed the misery of one family who tried to escape this resettlement program, including the initial use of food to in effect coax this family into resettlement.

Today, we are introducing that concurrent resolution, which in addition to myself, Senator HATFIELD, and Senator INOUYE, is cosponsored by 13 of our colleagues. I would anticipate that many others would wish to join us as the reports of the misery caused by this resettlement program continue.

Our concurrent resolution, which is identical to the one which has been introduced by Congresswoman ROUKEMA and cosponsored by among others, Congressmen FASCELL and BROOMFIELD, calls upon the Ethiopian Government to stop any new settlement movements; to open up the resettlement areas to United Nations monitors and to the free press; to allow freedom of movement to those who do not wish to stay in the resettlement areas; and to use those resources which the Government has been using in the resettlement program instead for relief and rehabilitation.

Mr. President, the concurrent resolution we are offering will join the Senate with the House and the administration in expressing our horror at this ongoing tragedy and hopefully will be the type of pressure which will result in the Ethiopian Government's abandonment of their forced resettlement policy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Washington Post article I referred to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ETHIOPIANS RISK LIVES FLEEING RESETTLEMENT

(By Blaine Harden)

ED DAMAZIN, SUDAN—The dismal odyssey of the young Ethiopian mother began last spring with a false promise of free food.

That promise lured Letehawaria Gebre Yessus into a trip that took her from the highlands of northern Ethiopia to a swampy resettlement camp in its southwestern corner. Late in February, after an escape journey of three months, she found her way here to a refugee camp in the thorn-tree badlands of eastern Sudan.

En route, she said, she was forced by Ethiopian soldiers to abandon her two children, and she watched her husband die of disease in a crowded transit camp. After fleeing Ethiopia, she said, she was robbed, beaten, raped and held as a slave by Sudanese rebels.

The woman's story, which she quietly told in the shade of a refugee tent, echoes those of many of the nearly 1,000 Ethiopian refugees here who have fled the resettlement program that the Ethiopian government insists is the only possible long-term solution to chronic famine in the country.

Nearly 600,000 northern Ethiopians have been moved south by the program since November 1984. When it began, Tamrat Kebede, the Ethiopian official responsible for designing the program, said in an interview in Addis Ababa that the resettlement would be voluntary, that families would not be split and that each family would be given about five acres of land to farm privately.

Tamrat said then that these conditions would guarantee the human rights and self-respect of resettled famine victims, and would ensure needed grass-roots support.

But interviews here with escapees from resettlement camps, along with the reports of researchers and relief workers who have conducted random surveys among refugees, indicate that the Ethiopian government has widely violated and ignored its present conditions.

As Ethiopia's famine abates, the resettlement program continues, with a goal of moving 1.5 million people by the end of this year. The program has become by far the most contentious issue between Marxist Ethiopia and the western governments and private relief organizations that supply most of its famine assistance.

The Ethiopian government temporarily suspended the resettlement program at the end of last month in response to criticism from western aid donors. The suspension, to last an indefinite period, was ordered "for a period of consolidation and to digest what they have already done," a senior western aid official in Addis Ababa told United Press International last weekend.

According to western aid officials in the Ethiopian capital, the final 1,000 resettlers arrived in Asosa from Welo Province in the last week of February. Ethiopian government officials, while not officially announcing the suspension, said last week that internal and external criticism has forced a government review of resettlement. But western aid officials say that it was primarily outside donor criticism that forced the suspension.

While Italy and Canada have given money specifically to support resettlement, most other donors have expressed reservations. The United States, by far the largest food donor, has condemned the program as a diversion of resources better spent in the famine-affected north. A French-based relief agency, Doctors Without Borders, was expelled from Ethiopia last fall for charging that up to 100,000 persons had died as a result of resettlement.

Most critics of resettlement contend that it has a political, not a humanitarian, aim: to depopulate the rebel-dominated north, where the government has been unable for nearly a quarter century to impose military control.

The Ethiopian government has admitted to some abuses in the program by "overzealous local officials." But it maintains that the idea of moving famine victims from the drought-razed northern highlands to the fertile southwestern lowlands is sound. The Soviet-supported rulers have dismissed most criticism of resettlement as motivated by western, anti-Marxist ideology disguised as humanitarian concern. At the same time, the Ethiopian government strictly restricts outside access to resettlement areas.

The stories told here in this two-month-old refugee camp come not from outsiders but from peasant farmers from the Welo and Tigray regions of northern Ethiopia. In 13 separate interviews here, they told a consistent story, details of which are supported by earlier interviews in Ethiopia with relief officials.

Most of the refugees said they were "tricked" into gathering in northern villages by government-circulated promises that the "Red Cross" would be distributing free food. Many left their children behind, thinking that they would soon be coming back home. However, they were surrounded by Ethiopian soldiers and loaded onto buses or helicopters bound for transit camps. Several refugees said they saw soldiers shoot and kill farmers who tried to run away.

The settlers described several weeks in transit camps, with shortages of food, water and medical care, as well as many deaths from illness. They then were packed into Soviet Antonov transport planes or buses for the 600- to 700-mile journey south to resettlement sites near Asosa and Gambela. Several said that people who became critically ill during the bus ride south were hauled out of the buses and abandoned at roadsides.

In Gambela and Asosa, lowland areas where more than 145,000 people have been resettled in scores of new villages in the past 16 months, the refugees said there were chronic shortages of food, clothes and shelter. Many said they became ill with malaria, a disease they had no experience with in the northern highlands.

Party cadre and soliders, the refugees said, forced the settlers to clear land and build houses, enforcing discipline by beating and imprisoning those who refused to work. In Asosa and Gambela, refugees said they were forced to work on cooperative farms and were allowed little time to tend their small gardens.

Gebre Selassie, 24, a political refugee here who said he worked in Asosa for the Ethiopian government as a medical assistant, supported the accounts of many refugees by saying that the major health problem in the camps was malnutrition.

"Most of the people in the camps were sick because of hunger. They were not given enough food," said Gebre Selassie. He said most settlers were given about a pound of corn a day at Asosa, an amount nutritionists say is insufficient to maintain body weight while doing heavy work.

Refugees here said they were warned frequently by party cadre against trying to escape from the camps. In weekly "political education" meetings, the cadre warned settlers of Ethiopian soldiers who would shoot them, of wild animals in nearby jungles and of allegedly cannibalistic tribesmen across the nearby Sudanese border.

Yet, between last November and the first of this year, the refugees estimate that about 3,000 Ethiopians tried to escape from Gambela and Asosa. They said many were captured inside the border and that some drowned trying to cross rivers into Sudan.

Letehawaria, the 27-year-old mother of two whose husband died in transit before reaching Gambela, was one of several hundred women captured by Sudanese rebel soldiers, believed by relief officials here to belong to the Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA), which controls nearby areas of southern Sudan.

According to several of these women who arrived here last month, the Sudanese rebel soldiers raped them and forced them to live for a month as slaves in Sudanese villages. Relief officials believe these men were members of the Dinka tribe, which dominates that region of Sudan.

The SPLA, which receives arms and funding from the Ethiopian government, also extored money from many of the fleeing Ethiopians, stole their clothes and forced some of them back to resettlement camps, the refugees said.

Those who eluded or later escaped the rebel soldiers have been brought here to Ed Damazin by the Sudanese military. They are temporarily under the care of the Fellowship for African Relief, a small Canadian relief agency. The U.N. refugee commission in Khartoum says many of them soon will be transported north and allowed to return across the border into rebel-held areas of Ethiopia.

Like many of his fellow resettlement escapees, Yibran Alemayeh, 54, said he wants to find his wife and six children. He said soldiers rounded him up a year ago in the Tigrayan city of Adua. If he cannot find his family, Yibran says he will join the Tigray People's Liberation Front, which has been fighting the Ethiopian government for more than a decade.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 117—SUPPORTING RIAS RADIO IN THE AMERICAN SECTOR OF BERLIN

Mr. SIMON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 117

Whereas the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights and the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (also known as the "Helsinki Accords") declare that it is in the best interest of mankind to allow information to flow freely across international boundaries;

Whereas a constructive dialogue designed to enhance mutual understanding between peoples and governments reinforces the "spirit of Geneva";

Whereas the free flow of information among the people of Berlin and to the German Democratic Republic promotes mutual understanding and thus serves the universal cause of peace and human freedom;

Whereas RIAS, the Radio in the American Sector of Berlin, serves the cause of freedom by communicating accurate information and a wide spectrum of Western values to all of people of Berlin and to the German Democratic Republic;

Whereas RIAS is a joint effort of the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany and is an outstanding example of partnership and cooperation between these nations; and

Whereas RIAS is an important symbol of the commitment of the United States to the freedom of Berlin: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress, recognizing the significance of RIAS, the Radio in the American Sector of Berlin, for improving communication, enhancing mutual understanding, and aiding the free flow of information among the people of Berlin and to the German Democratic Republic—

(1) reaffirms its strong support for the effort of RIAS to serve the cause of freedom through the communication of information and Western values to all of the people of Berlin and to the German Democratic Republic; and

(2) reaffirms RIAS as a symbol of the commitment of the United States to the freedom of Berlin.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am pleased to submit this concurrent resolution expressing the support of Congress for RIAS, Radio in the American Sector of Berlin. RIAS was established 40 years ago at a critical moment in European history. The free flow of information was essential during those early years of postwar recovery, the Berlin airlift, and East European struggle with Soviet occupation.

Now, in 1986, communications between the two blocs in Central Europe is no less important. We have a dual mission in a Europe still divided by artificial barriers: to tell our side of the story, while encouraging less propaganda and less hostility. This sometimes requires a delicate balancing act, but through the years we have always held high standards of professionalism. USIA is to be commended for its vital role in making information available in places where it otherwise might not be made known.

RIAS does this, and at virtually no cost to the Treasury. The Government of West Germany picks up 96 percent of the expense in running RIAS, but the programming is put together by USIA. It is by all accounts widely popular in many parts of Eastern Europe, particularly in East Germany. I commend RIAS, and urge my colleagues to join me in expressing our support for this worthwhile venture.

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, it's now been almost 2 months since America celebrated its first national holiday commemorating the birth of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. That we did so was right and proper. And even though I have supported every piece of civil rights legislation introduced in the Senate since I became a Member in 1975, one of the things I am proudest of is that I was an original cosponsor of the bill that has made Dr. King's birthday a national holiday.

As a country, we have come far since the days of hate in Selma, the bus boycott in Montgomery, and the assassination in Memphis. But our work is far from over. Whether you look at jobs, housing, or virtually any other aspect of our national life, it's clear that we have not yet reached that day that Dr. King dreamed of—a day when people will be judged not by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character. And so long as any discrimination exists in our society—whether for race, sex, age, religion, handicap, or national origin—then we as a nation must seek to eradicate it.

That is why the theme of this year's King birthday celebration was "living the dream"; it was a recognition not only that the dream goes on, but that the work that lies ahead of us is every bit as important as the memories that lie behind us.

Last January, from one end of this great country to the other, Americans of every color and every political persuasion rededicated themselves to the ideal of equality, and pledged their best efforts toward making that dream a reality. That rededication occurred everywhere; that is, except in the Congress of the United States.

Actually, those of us in Congress did what most people have come to expect of us: We unveiled a bust of Dr. King in the Capitol.

Some of us traveled to Atlanta or took part in other major ceremonies across the country.

Still others of us participated in the observances that took place in our home States.

But as a body, the U.S. Senate took no concrete action to show that it—and we—are truly serious about "living the dream."

In fact, I think most Americans would be shocked if they were to find out that despite our rhetorical commitment to the cause of equality, Congress has specifically exempted itself from most of the civil rights laws enacted in this Nation.

In other words, Congress doesn't have to live by the same rules everyone else does. If a Senator wants to discriminate on his staff against blacks—or Jews, or Hispanics, or women—he can do it with no questions asked and with no fear of consequences.

In my view, that is worse than wrong. It's outrageous. It's the rankest kind of hypocrisy. And I hope my colleagues will join with me today in declaring it completely unacceptable.

Laws that are good enough for everybody else ought to be good enough for us. And the civil rights principles we've insisted that others adhere to certainly should hold equal sway in the Halls and the offices of the people who wrote them.

For all those reasons, I am today submitting the Senate fair employment relations resolution. As some of my colleagues may remember, this isn't the first time I've brought this legislation to the floor. I do hope, however, that it will be the last time.

The purpose of my legislation is very simple. It would merely ensure that all Senators—and that the Senate as an institution—adheres to Senate rule 42, which prohibits us from making employment decisions based on race, sex, religion, handicap, national origin, or age. Right now, this is a rule without effect and without teeth—for there is currently no means of enforcing it.

This legislation would provide the enforcement mechanism. Let me very briefly summarize how it would work.

As you know, title VII of the Civil Rights Act offers protection against employment discrimination to employees in the private sector as well as to State and local governments. My legislation will establish a similar system for hearing and resolving complaints of discrimination filed by Senate employees.

It will do this by establishing a Senate Fair Employment Relations Office, governed by a six-member board, that will develop policy and guidelines.

The Senate Fair Employment Relations Office will be responsible for counseling, investigating complaints, and attempting to resolve cases in which discrimination is found. All findings will be reviewed by the board and, in the case of an appeal, by the Select Committee on Ethics.

Any employee who feels that he or she has been discriminated against would be required to consult a counselor before filing an informal or formal complaint. If discrimination is found, the board will determine the appropriate remedy.

Finally, my resolution would not require any additional appropriations. Both the office and the board would be funded through the Senate contingent fund's miscellaneous items account from moneys already available.

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues in the Senate will overwhelmingly approve this resolution. By doing so, we can clearly demonstrate our conviction that the protections of our civil rights laws would be extended to every American including the employees of the U.S. Senate. We can prove our commitment to a single legal standard in this country, instead of applying one standard to ourselves, and a different one to everyone else. And by passing this resolution, we can show the people of this Nation that we, too, are dedicated to "living the dream"—the dream that someday the blight of bigotry and the stain of discrimination will be wiped forever from the face of our land. That is the dream for which Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., gave his life. By passing this resolution, we can show that we are determined to redeem that dream in ours.●

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, last week I introduced a bill, S. 2146, at the request of the administration to strengthen our fair housing laws. Today I am filing an amendment to make certain technical corrections to that bill, and to add language which would provide for civil penalties of up to $100,000 for repeated violations of the fair housing law. The section-by-section summary I placed in the RECORD when I introduced the bill specified that such civil penalties would be available, but due to a drafting oversight, language to that effect was omitted from the bill.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

SALUTE TO THE YMCA

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I join my friend SONNY MONTGOMERY, in the House of Representatives, and my colleagues in the Senate, in saluting the YMCA's 125th anniversary in its service to members of our Armed Forces.

I am honored to be a member of the anniversary committee for the armed services YMCA. This year marks the YMCA's 125th anniversary of service to our military community. In celebration of this event and to kick off national attention to our military community, a dinner honoring President Reagan, as Commander-in-Chief, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and other key Armed Forces leaders will be held by ASYMCA April 22. April was chosen for the initial celebration event because National Volunteer Week falls in that month and, it is the anniversary of the commencement of the Civil War, when YMCA volunteers first began their work with the Armed Forces. I would like to take a moment, Mr. President, to give my colleagues a history of the great service this group has done in support of our country's military both in war and peace. I also want to explain some of the services they are currently rendering to our young military community.

One week after the start of the Civil War a group of YMCA volunteers began providing helpful services to soldiers on both sides. This spirit of volunteerism continued when on November 15, 1861, representatives from 15 YMCA's created the U.S. Christian Commission in order to coordinate overall YMCA efforts. The commission's initial purpose was to alleviate the suffering of countless thousands of soldiers by providing them with both spiritual and physical comfort. The USCC was the Nation's first large scale civilian volunteer service corps. At this time agencies such as the Red Cross had not yet been created and therefore volunteers were recruited from many fields to aid the commission with its efforts.

The YMCA also established a War Prisoners Aid Program during the Civil War. This program distributed food, clothing, medical supplies, books, and magazines to Union soldiers in Confederate prisons and also ministered to the needs of Confederate soldiers in various Northern prisons.

Following the Civil War, the YMCA established the Nation's first recreational, sports, and counseling services for military personnel through its peacetime volunteer Militia Camp Program.

With the beginning of the Spanish-American War in the spring of 1898, the YMCA began its tradition of "following the flag" by sending volunteers to Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. The YMCA acted so quickly with this effort that its supplies were in Cuba and the Philippines before many of the Army's own supplies. Teddy Roosevelt's Rough Riders' early dispatches were written on YMCA stationary; and troops in the Philippines used YMCA medical supplies. Following the close of the war, a permanent Army and Navy committee was established to give national direction to the YMCA's work.

When the United States entered the First World War in 1917, the YMCA immediately offered its services to the Government, an offer which was quickly accepted. The YMCA's War Prisoners Aid Program was again implemented, but on a much larger scale than had been previously established during the Civil War. Never before in history had any organization brought aid to so many men, over such vast areas, and under such diverse conditions as the ASYMCA did during World War I.

After the First World War, the YMCA was the only postwar civilian organization carrying on an extensive peacetime program for servicemen. In February 1941, the YMCA joined five other national voluntary organizations as the principle founder of the United Services Organization [the USO].

During the Second World War, the YMCA undertook a massive humanitarian task similar to the one undertaken in World War I. The prisoner-of-war work was reinstated but it was far more extensive and of greater magnitude and duration than during the First World War. These efforts continued after the war until 1951 but on a reduced scale.

The Armed Services YMCA continued to provide services to military personnel throughout the Korean war, the Vietnam conflict, and into the mid-seventies.

With the establishment of the All-Volunteer armed services came new demands on organizations serving our young military people. The Armed Services YMCA adjusted its programs and responded to these new needs.

Today the ASYMCA continues to offer effective and meaningful service to young military personnel—both single and married. Outreach centers, counseling and mediation services, trips, tours, child care, day camps, recreational programs, and drop-in centers are among the various services that the ASYMCA provides to our military communities. These programs supplement those set up by the Armed Forces. They offer home-like recreational opportunities as well as social services. Through these activities the Armed Service YMCA forms a bridge between the Armed Forces and the local community.

In addition to these direct services, the ASYMCA operates a national center in support of the professional service providers within the Armed Forces. This unit, the Military Family Support Center, initiates a wide-range of professional services, including training seminars and conferences.

Enriching the quality of life for military people is at the center of today's YMCA service with the Armed Forces. There is widespread recognition that healthy families and lifestyles contribute substantially to mission readiness and retention. Not only do such wholesome lifestyles benefit the individuals of the Armed Forces but they also benefit the Defense Establishment itself.

I ask Senators to join me in supporting the Armed Services YMCA in their States as well as here in Washington on April 22.●

U.S. FIRE ADMINISTRATION AND THE NATIONAL FIRE ACADEMY

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the Senator from Washington [Mr. GORTON], in sponsoring legislation (S. 2180) to authorize appropriations for the U.S. Fire Administration and the National Fire Academy.

Fire is one of the leading causes of accidental death in this country. It seems that we are bombarded daily with reports of death by fire in our cities and towns. Too often it is reported that this needless loss of life could have been prevented through a smoke alarm, better building materials and, most important, better education and information.

Since its dedication in the fall of 1979, the programs offered at the National Fire Academy in Emmitsburg, MD, have trained 12,000 people per year. Many of this number are volunteer firefighters who attend the Academy's weekend programs. Without the Academy, these people would not have the opportunity to learn from the professional staff.

For example, the National Fire Academy is now offering a 13-week command and staff program. This program allows firefighters and administrators from all over the country to receive the best and latest information in an academic setting.

The bill will support the Academy as well as other programs by restoring the travel stipends and lodging costs. This is important because many local jurisdictions would be unable to afford to send their personnel for this vital training. It is also important because the Fire Academy is not authorized to provide funds to local communities for fire training. Education must take place at the Academy.

We are all conscious these days of the need to reduce the Federal budget deficit. This bill reflects that goal by providing an 18-percent cut from the fiscal year 1986 authorization for the U.S. Fire Administration and a 7-percent cut from the current appropriation for the National Fire Academy.

The programs authorized under the Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974 are too important to lose. We simply cannot afford to have the activities of the U.S. Fire Administration and the National Fire Academy eliminated or reduced. I hope that Senators will join the Senator from Washington in supporting his bill.●

CARDIOPULMONARY RESUSCITATION [CPR]

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, not long ago, a U.S. Senate Service Department employee slumped to the floor, the victim of a heart attack. His breathing stopped and he had no pulse: he was clinically dead. But he was not biologically dead. For 4 minutes after his pulse stopped there was the possibility of beginning his breathing and heart pumping activity again and maintaining it artificially for an indefinite length of time until professional medical services were available. This story has a happy ending. A capitol policeman ran to the rescue, started CPR procedure and kept this Senate employee alive until an emergency medical team arrived.

During the last 2 days, my entire staff has been trained in my office in CPR—cardiopulmonary resuscitation procedure—by superbly qualified Hill nurses, Beverly Wallace and Estelle Luther. The training required two mornings—a total of 6 hours. As a result, any member of my staff will be able to keep alive a Senate employee or a family member, who suffered a heart attack, was choking, had drowned, had a reaction to drugs, was asphyxiated or was unconscious because of electric shock.

One of the most startling ideas in the history of medicine is the realization that "sudden death" can be curable. Even more astonishing is the realization that this apparent miracle can be brought about not by space-age wizardry or esoteric skills, but by any of us, anywhere, using no tools but our hands, our lungs, and our brains. The mechanical processes of breathing and blood pulsation can be maintained artificially and keep a clinically dead person from biological death.

Next week the staffs in both my home offices in Oregon will be taking CPR training, becoming a part of the 15 million Americans who have learned the procedure. More importantly they will become a part of the nationwide, volunteer, emergency rescue team that saved over 120,000 lives last year. That means that 120,000 people are living today only because a layman knew the procedure of CPR and was able to administer it in an emergency situation before a skilled medical team arrived.

That group of 120,000 people include babies saved by their mothers at home, workers saved in their offices by officemates, young men and women saved at swimming pools by friends, wives saved from choking in restaurants by their husbands: average people, doing average things, saved by other average people.

Thousands of people intersect our lives in the halls and offices of the Senate complex each year. No doubt at least 1 or 2 of them will be 1 of the 650,000 people who die from heart attacks in the United States each year and will collapse somewhere around us here in the Senate. A cadre of Senate employees trained in CPR could prevent the death of those individuals.

But, unfortunately, Senate offices have lagged behind House offices in understanding this fact and in committing themselves to taking the time to learn the CPR procedure. Mrs. Wallace and Mrs. Luther are ready and willing with an excellent film, a succinct presentation and useful training devices. I urge each of my colleagues to make this training mandatory for their staff. It may help one of us to return someone close to us to life.●

VETERANS BEARING THE BRUNT OF BUDGET CUTS

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, in recent years there has been a continual erosion of programs created to provide education and employment opportunities, housing assistance, and health benefits for the individuals who served in America's armed services. For as long as I can remember, it has been our Nation's policy, and I believe an obligation, to provide certain programs for our veterans. Mr. President, I am concerned that enactment of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, Public Law 99-177, and reductions recommended in the President's fiscal year 1987 budget, may cause many veterans to question the sincerity of that commitment.

On February 15, 1986, the Hagerstown Daily Mail published an article written by Commander Dale L. Renaud, national commander of the American Legion, which underscores some of the inequities veterans will endure under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and the President's fiscal year 1987 budget proposal. Commander Renaud raises serious concerns which, I am certain, must be shared by thousands of individuals nationwide who served in America's armed services and who depend on certain veterans programs. Knowing that many of my colleagues share my concern about the future of these programs I wanted to bring Commander Renaud's article to the attention of the entire Senate.

The article follows:

VETERANS BEARING THE BRUNT OF BUDGET CUTS

(By Dale L. Renaud)

Proposed reductions in federal spending during 1986, forced on the current budget by provisions of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, pose a significant and immediate threat to some of the nation's most vulnerable—yet deserving—citizens.

As Congress and the administration begin to wrestle with still another federal budget—FY 1987—it would be unfortunate to let this year's cuts be taken without due concern for the hundreds of thousands of citizens directly affected. We deserve a full discussion of the effect of deficit control legislation.

The nearly three million men and women I represent, all veterans of war or war-time service, are united in their belief that of all citizens, veterans in need deserve first consideration when the wealth of the nation is disturbed. Yet the administration has proposed that $39 million be eliminated from veterans' readjustment programs designed to provide educational and vocational assistance or rehabilitation, and from programs established to assist the handicapped veterans in need of special equipment in their homes and automobiles.

The Office of Management and Budget instructed the Veterans Administration to make the $39 million cut, despite clear prohibitions in the deficit reduction legislation prohibiting cuts in such basic entitlement programs. By that action, the administration has shown that of the two ways to control federal spending—the easy way versus the fair way—it has taken the easy way out: Identify a vulnerable, apparently powerless, group such as handicapped or untrained veterans and tell them that they can no longer receive the assistance held out to them as a promise, should the need ever arise, from a grateful nation.

The fair way, on the other hand, is for all groups to share the burden equally. But the Office of Management and Budget has not chosen that path.

For example, the majority of Vietnam veterans who now are pursuing their educations are those who have undergone readjustment problems following their military service, or who have faced severe economic problems because of unemployment or lack of skills.

Vietnam veterans are not the only veterans unfairly targeted. Those who have managed to achieve some level of economic stability now face severe restrictions on their ability to finance "GI loan" home purchases. Others, struggling under burdensome and exhorbitantly high mortgage interest rates, are barred from re-financing their homes to forestall foreclosures or other losses. But veterans are not the only losers in this scheme. With the establishment of a limit on home purchasers prices under VA guarantees, entire sections of major cities, are, in effect, redlined. Why extract such a clearly uneconomical price?

And perhaps most poignant, is the elimination of $117.5 million from the Veterans Administration medical care system. There, where the nation's oldest, sickest and poorest past defenders must turn when all other options are gone, the reduction means at least 1,300 fewer people to provide direct bedside health care in a system already woefully understaffed. And no matter what may have been reported otherwise, the VA health care system represents the single most cost-effective health care system in the nation. Moreover, fewer than 10 percent of the eligible veterans ever set foot in a VA hospital—in an era when the number of those applying for treatment and subsequently denied it has increased from an average of 21,000 a month to 37,000 per month last year alone.

These reductions are only a few of those to be imposed on the veterans of America. The cuts are wrong. They are callous. And they are indefensible. The men and women I represent are realistic. We know this nation must get its staggering spending excesses under control. But it must be done across the board, with corresponding cuts in all federal agencies. There can be no excuse for asking one segment of the population to bear the burden alone, as a careful examination of the past 10 years of spending for veterans will show has been done.

By immediate and concerned action, all Americans can help assure that promises made in time of war are kept in time of peace. I urge you all to contact your representatives in Washington, and become informed on this issue. . . .●

COMMUNITY SERVICES BLOCK GRANT

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, we are all aware that the number of people in poverty has increased substantially in recent years in this country. This year, the Community Services Block Grant [CSBG]—the only piece of Federal legislation targeted to providing services and opportunities to low-income people—is under consideration for reauthorization. The administration has proposed the termination of this block grant. I believe that it is imperative for the sake of the poor, that this legislation be reauthorized.

In testimony before the Congress, the administration has expressed its support for Community Action Agencies, the chief recipients of CSBG funding, but has proposed elimination of the Community Services Block Grant based on three assertions: First, that CAA's do not need CSBG to operate; that the administrative allowances of other programs operated by CAA's could be used for agencywide functions now supported by CSBG; second, that CSBG-funded services duplicate the Social Services Block Grant; and third, that CSBG services are not unique and necessary to the poor.

Recently the Government Accounting Office [GAO] conducted a study of CAA's, the results of which refute all three of these charges.

In testimony last month before the Subcommittee on Human Resources, J. William Gadsby of GAO testified that visits to 16 CAA's in 8 States early this year showed that most Community Action Agencies are using the entire administrative allowances of other programs to operate their own programs. Frequently, the administrative allowances of those programs are not sufficient and CSBG is legitimately supplementing administrative costs of other Federal programs. Two examples cited by GAO are the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Program which sometimes gives zero administrative funding to CAA's, the major operators of this program. Another program mentioned by GAO as needing a CSBG administrative supplement is the Department of Energy's Weatherization Program which provides only a 5-percent administrative allowance. CSBG funds are also used, most often, to pay the salaries of the CAA executive director and the CAA fiscal officer.

Contrary to the administration's charge that CSBG funding to CAA's could be replaced by the administrative allowances of other CAA programs, GAO indicates that not only would CAA's not be able to operate without the CSBG but that some other Federal programs would not be able to operate or would have to shift dwindling program funds to an increased administrative cost.

A second administration change that the GAO testimony refutes is that CSBG funded services duplicate the activities of the Social Services Block Grant. GAO reports that in some instances CSBG supported services did, on the surface, seem similar to those provided by the local social services agency, but on closer examination were found to be different. GAO found that CAA's and local social services agencies generally have mechanisms in place to assure that there is an awareness of each other's programs and only one activity in one community was operated by both agencies.

Finally, the administration has charged that CSBG funds are not unique and necessary. GAO stated, "Essentially, CSBG is viewed as the discretionary money that enables CAA's to identify community needs, provide services not available under other Federal or State programs, and support administrative operations." There are no other Federal, State, or local funds to perform these unique and necessary functions other than the Community Services Block Grant.

It was interesting to me that, according to a New York Times article on February 18, James Miller, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, in an appearance before the House Budget Committee, identified the Community Services Block Grant as the source of Federal assistance to local governments for programs for the homeless. CSBG is used extensively for homeless programs and CAA's in Oregon and throughout the country have homeless programs. My interest was stirred, however, by the fact that Mr. Miller did not appear to know that his own budget proposed terminating this block grant.

I do not believe that this administration does know very much about the Community Services Block Grant except that it serves the poor and is, therefore, targeted for elimination.

Mr. President, I have followed and supported CAA legislation throughout its history because I believe that CAA's perform invaluable, front-line services for the Nation's poor. Now we have the GAO testimony that entirely eliminates the administration's rationale for eliminating the block grant and strong indications of how valuable this program is.

I urge my colleagues to support continuation of the Community Services Block Grant legislation and that the full GAO testimony be included in the RECORD.

The material follows.

STATEMENT OF J. WILLIAM GADSBY, ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR, HUMAN RESOURCES DIVISION

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee: I am pleased to be here today to discuss the Community Services Block Grant (CSBG). GAO is just completing visits to eight states to review 16 community action agencies (CAAs), the primary recipient of CSBG funds. The states are: California, Colorado, Florida, Iowa, Michigan, Mississippi, New York, and Vermont. The 16 community action programs reflect the diverse character of CAAs nationwide. They range from urban programs in New York City to rural programs in Bonifay, Florida. Half are publicly managed and about half are run by private non-profit organizations. The geographic areas they serve range from a single city to a 10 county area. In addition to visiting CAAs, we discussed the community action programs with social services agency officials and top local govenment officials in the same communities.

My testimony this morning will focus on our preliminary analysis of three major issues:

What do CSBG funds support?

Do activities funded by the Social Services and Community Services block grants duplicate each other?

How could the loss of CSBG funds affect CAAs?

CSBG SUPPORTS BOTH SERVICES AND ADMINISTRATION

Eleven of the 16 CAAs we visited used 70 percent or more of their 1985 CSBG funds to deliver services to the poor. The most commonly funded services funded by the 16 CAAs were (1) information, referral, and outreach activities; (2) emergency services, such as providing groceries or temporary shelter; and (3) nutrition services, such as self-help gardening and food-canning projects. CAAs also used their CSBG funds to help individuals obtain financial assistance for housing, train home day-care providers, arrange transportation, and provide home meals for the elderly, ill, and handicapped.

These same 11 CAAs used less than 30 percent of their 1985 CSBG funds for administrative expenses. The other five CAAs used amounts for administration ranging from 31 percent to Los Angeles to 58 percent in Steuben County, New York. These funds were used primarily to pay office expenses, such as salaries of the executive director and fiscal officer.

Most CAA officials also told us that CSBG plays an important role in supporting the administration of certain other federal programs. For example, Agriculture's surplus commodity food program provides no administrative expense funding, and Energy's weatherization program provides 5 percent. In such situations, CSBG funds are used to pay the administrative costs that exceed allowed amounts.

Essentially, CSBG is viewed as the discretionary money that enables CAAs to identify community needs, provide services not available under other federal or state programs, and support administrative operations.

CSBG-FUNDED SERVICES COMPLEMENT RATHER THAN DUPLICATE SSBG-FUNDED SERVICES

Our preliminary analysis shows that in most instances, the CSBG-supported services do not duplicate those provided by the local social services agencies. In the communities we visited, CSBG-supported services were often targeted to fill specific unmet needs. For example, the CAAs we visited frequently used CSBG funds to support nutrition and transportation programs, which are not eligible for Social Services Block Grant funding.

In some instances, CSBG-supported services did, on the surface, seem similar to those provided by the local social services agency. But, closer inspection during our on-site reviews showed that, in all but one case, either the types of clients served or the specific services offered were quite different. In Newport, Vermont, for example, the social services agency provides day-care services while the community action agency uses CSBG funds to support the training of day-care personnel. Both are labeled day-care services. In Detroit, the social services transportation program provides medically related transportation for the elderly, while the CAA's transportation program provides for non-medical transportation needs, such as grocery shopping.

CAAs and local social services agencies are usually aware of each other's services and try to prevent duplication. For example, in El Paso County, Colorado, a local official told us that a local agency serves as a clearinghouse for services to low-income persons, and both public and private agencies check with this clearinghouse before providing services to new clients.

As previously mentioned, in only one instance did we find duplicative types of services. Both the local social service agency and the community action agency in Hattiesburg, Mississippi, provided a similar emergency service, which included cash payments to the poor. Neither was aware of the other's program.

LOSS OF CSBG FUNDS COULD AFFECT CAA'S

According to the CSBG's national voluntary reporting system, CSBG provided about 11 percent of community action agencies' total budgets in 1984 on a nationwide basis. For the 16 locations we visited, CSBG's share of total CAA funding in 1985 ranged from 3 percent in Des Moines to 33 percent in Denver and amounted to less than 11 percent at nine locations. This proportion represents a decline since 1981, when CSBG provided less than 11 percent of total funding at only four of the locations we visited. However, even though CSBG funds represent a small proportion of total funding, CAA directors told us that these funds are very important in administration and service delivery.

How the loss of CSBG funds would affect CAA's is not certain at this time. However, two factors could influence their ability to continue operations.

First, some suggest that existing federal and state grants could be used to fund administrative operations now funded by CSBG. However, at all but two of the CAAs we visited, other grants were being charged the full amounts allowed for administrative expenses.

Second, state and local governments could fund CAAs by replacing lost CSBG funds. While state and local actions cannot be predicted when community services funds were reduced in the early 1980's, 3 of the 16 localities and 2 of the 8 states we visited mitigated the cuts. While the state and local officials we talked to were generally supportive of CAA activities, none thought their state or local governments would replace lost CSBG funds.

This concludes my statement and I would be pleased to respond to any questions you may have.

A MEMORIAL TO ZEPHYR

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, recently, a constituent of mine, the wife of popular singer Tom Rush, sent me a copy of a song she wrote and performed. The song is a touching, sensitive perspective on the profound effect abortion has on all those involved—not only the unborn child, here named Zephyr, but also the mother. I encourage all my colleagues to read the words of this song and consider precisely what has been done to the million and a half women each year who suffer the physical, emotional and spiritual pain of legalized abortion, I ask that the lyric sheet for the song be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

A MEMORIAL TO ZEPHYR

(Words and Music by Beverly Rush)

Zephyr, you're the gentle wind,
The silent breeze in my life.
Zephyr, though a gentle wind,
You brought a storm in my life.
When you blew into my life,
My body felt so strange.
If I could change one thing in this world,
It's the day I brought you pain.
Zephyr, you're the gentle wind,
The silent breeze in my life.
Zephyr, though a silent sigh,
You're the deepest cry of my life.
When I sought the grace of God,
He took away my shame.
Though the years have passed, it's
Not 'til today, that you've ever had a name.
Zephyr, you're the gentle wind,
The silent breeze in my life.
Zephyr, you're the gentle wind,
The first fruit in my life.
Now there is hope for mothers and fathers,
Who drink this mournful cup.
Know that every child who has been forsaken,
The Lord will take him up.
And love, and hold him,
And keep your treasure safe.
And when you are ready,
In your heart he'll find his place.
Zephyr, you're the gentle wind,
The silent breeze in our lives.
Zephyr, though a silent breeze,
You have sung your song in our hearts,
You have sung your song in our hearts.●

MAJOR SMALL BUSINESS ORGANIZATIONS OPPOSE THE ELIMINATION OF SBA AS AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, on March 10, 1986, key organizations which represent virtually the entire small business community submitted to the chairman and members of the Senate Budget Committee a statement expressing their strong opposition to the administration's fiscal year 1987 budget submission for the Small Business Administration [SBA]. The statement was endorsed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Small Business Investment Companies, the National Federation of Independent Business, the National Small Business Association, the Small Business Legislative Council, Small Business United, and the Vietnam Veterans of America. These groups all oppose the President's proposed elimination of important SBA programs and the transfer of SBA to the Department of Commerce. In recognizing the need to reduce the deficit, they state:

> We will not support, however, the virtual elimination of the agency as proposed in the administration's budget proposal. The SBA has played a vital role in creating an environment for the growth and expansion of small business and it is clear to all what small business has meant to job creation efforts. Preserving the independence of SBA and preserving the strength and vitality of small business are synonymous.

Instead of the administration's proposal, they urge the Senate Budget Committee to adopt the bipartisan budget proposal which Senator BUMPERS and I, on behalf of the Senate Small Business Committee, formally submitted to the Budget Committee in a letter on March 5, 1986. Our fiscal year 1987 budget proposal tracks very closely the conference agreement reached with the House of Representatives in title XVIII of the Reconciliation Act of 1985, H.R. 3128. As my colleagues will recall, that conference agreement is consistent with S. 408 which passed the Senate on July 16, 1985, by a vote of 94 to 3 and represents the product of a full year of negotiations with the administration and the Republican Senate leadership.

Mr. President, the key elements of the Weicker-Bumpers proposal are as follows:

Retain SBA as an independent agency with all of its core of financial, management, and procurement assistance programs intact.

Maintain the loan portfolio for normal collection.

Eliminate all direct loans except for economic opportunity, MESBIC's, handicapped and veterans loan programs, and freeze those programs at the fiscal year 1986 appropriated levels.

Eliminate the Non-physical Disaster Program.

Eliminate farmers' eligibility for SBA disaster loan assistance for disasters declared after September 30, 1985.

Require small business investment companies to sell their debentures in the private capital markets.

Require all 503 certified development company debentures be sold to the private capital markets by fiscal year 1988.

Maintain guarantee loan programs at current services levels.

Increase the fee for 7(a) borrowers from 1 to 2 percent and set the maximum guarantee for loans over $155,000 at 85 percent, and for loans under $155,000 require a 90-percent guarantee.

Maintain salaries and expenses at the CBO current services levels.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, our proposal would achieve $2.88 billion of outlay savings over 3 years and would reduce SBA's outlays by more than 70 percent by fiscal year 1989.

Small businesses lead the Nation in job creation, innovation and research, and productivity. Such a vital segment of our economy deserves to have a strong independent agency in the Federal Government to serve its interests. The Small Business Administration is the only Federal agency whose sole mission has been to serve small businesses, and small business organizations unanimously support its continuance as an independent agency.

I ask that the text of the small business organizations' statement be printed in the RECORD.

MARCH 10, 1986.

On behalf of the following organizations which constitute the breadth and depth of the small business community we strongly encourage the Committee on the Budget to adopt the bipartisan budget recommendations on the Small Business Administration as put forth by the Senate Committee on Small Business in its letter to the Committee on the Budget, March 5, 1986.

The Small Business Committee's proposal represents dramatic and substantial savings, a significant contribution to deficit reduction. Once again small business is willing to stand up and lead the fight for reductions. We will not support, however, the virtual elimination of the agency as proposed in the Administration's budget proposal. The SBA has played a vital role in creating an environment for the growth and expansion of small business and it is clear to all what small business has meant to job creation efforts. Preserving the independence on SBA and preserving the strength and vitality of small business are synonymous.

The Committee on Small Business proposal would achieve savings of $532 million in 1987. It reduces the budget by over 70 percent over three years. It emphasizes the guaranteed loan program, eliminates most direct lending and the non physical disaster loan program, but maintains the SBA as an independent agency with its most productive programs such advocacy, management assistance, procurement assistance, and the field operations intact.

We must emphasize the unanimity among the small business community on this issue. We hope you will adopt the Senate Small Business Committee's proposal as the best way to meet deficit reduction concerns and to address the needs of small business.

TAX REFORM

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to reiterate my support for Federal tax reform. I believe it is absolutely necessary that we pursue the administration's goal for a simpler, more fair tax system. Simplicity is the order of the day. I am, however, concerned with the proposed changes in the House-passed bill with respect to the method of taxing retirement benefits for individuals contributing to their retirement accounts. For this reason, Mr. President, I am pleased to be added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 304, a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate with respect to proposals before the Congress to retain the current tax treatment of benefits received by individuals who contribute to their retirement accounts which has been championed by my colleague from Virginia.

The House of Representatives chose to eliminate the current method of taxing retirement benefits for the nearly 20 million employees who contribute toward their retirement accounts. I believe, however, that to change the treatment of tax deferred annuities violates tax reform's stated goal of fairness.

Annuity benefits, under the present system, are not subject to taxation until an individual has recovered the capital originally contributed to the fund, approximately an 18-month period. H.R. 3838, however, would tax the annuity immediately. This change would place an additional burden on individuals who are experiencing a dramatic change in their lifestyles; that is, retirement.

Any plan to tax employee benefits is antifamily and antiworker. Americans rely on these benefits for their everyday needs. Any attempt to unfairly tax these benefits as income is wrong.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to adopt this resolution.●

THE MEIMANS: A DANGEROUS SITUATION

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I recently received a letter from Paris, France, requesting assistance for Inna and Naum Meiman, Soviet Jews who have been refuseniks for over 10 years. Inna is critically ill with cancer and Naum, at 74, is not getting any younger. The Meimans' plight is known throughout the world. No one in the West can afford to rest for a minute while the Meimans of the Soviet Union, and their fellow refuseniks, languish behind the Iron Curtain.

I ask that the letter from Mark Klein and Peter Shinkel of Paris, France, and the plea from my friend, Naum Meiman, be inserted into the RECORD.

I implore the Soviet authorities to allow Inna and Naum Meiman of Moscow to emigrate.

The letter follows:

PARIS, FRANCE,
March 6, 1986.

Hon. PAUL SIMON,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SIMON: We would like to draw to your attention the dramatic situation of Inna Meiman. We are addressing a letter to you written by her husband. It appears to us that Inna's situation has dramatically changed in the past two weeks. We have just come back from the Soviet Union where we met with the Meimans who urged us that time is running out.

There is no treatment existing in the Soviet Union that can help Inna let alone save her. The Meimans feel that your voice can help Inna obtain a treatment in the West.

Kindly send a telegramme to Secretary General Mikhail Gorbachev asking to allow Inna Meiman the last chance she may have to save her live.

Respectfully,
MARK B. KLEIN,
PETER SHINKEL.

PREVENT A CRIME

I appeal to people of good will every where to express their outrage and protest against what amounts to human sacrifice, with my wife, Inna Kitrosskaya-Meiman, 53 years old, slated as the victim.

Inna is being sacrificed for the imaginary security of the Soviet Union, which could supposedly be threatened if this mortally sick woman were allowed to leave this country.

In the fall of 1983, Inna was stricken by sarcoma on the back of her neck. In less than two years, she has undergone four difficult and dangerous operations. It was clear right after the first operation that the Soviet Union can provide no other treatment. Accordingly, my wife was generously offered hopeful treatment in oncological centers in Sweden, the United States, Israel, or France. The only thing required was that the Soviet authorities should not hamper her treatment, that they should allow her an exit visa to go for a cure abroad. This the Soviets refuse.

Last fall, the tumor grew again, but this time specialists found it impossible to operate once again. There having no other form of treatment in the Soviet Union, my wife has been left without medical attention.

Meanwhile, two historical breakthroughs were achieved in cancer therapy in the United States. An outstanding professor, Douglas P. Zipes, wrote to General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev that the new discoveries raised hope that my wife could be cured. Also, U.S. Senator Grassley wrote to Soviet Ambassador in the United States Dobrynin that my wife has been accepted for the Sloan-Kettering Experimental Program working on the new discoveries.

These facts are being ignored, and my failing wife is not being allowed to go for treatment abroad. The official explanation, given by the chief of the national Visa Office, was that my wife has been married to me for a long time, so that her departure had become a security risk.

My wife is a teacher of English. We married in 1981, and now for about three years she has been ill. It is naturally difficult to understand the mad logic of the authorities.

I am a mathematician, 74 years old. More than 30 years ago, I had the misfortune to do certain classified calculations of a quite academic nature, which have long lost all meaning and value. Anyone can see how false and absurd it is to talk about scientific and calculation secrets more than 30 years old. However, they were enough to deliberately doom my wife to death.

I appeal for help to save my wife's life before it is too late. February 12, 1986.

AUTOMOBILE RECORDKEEPING RULES

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today along with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY], I want to discuss the brief, but controversial history of the so-called automobile recordkeeping rules.

On February 24, 1986, I introduced S. 2090, a bill which would impose an 18-month moratorium on the regulations issued by the Internal Revenue Service [IRS] in this area. I was joined by Senators WALLOP, GRASSLEY, and BOREN in introducing that measure. Senators NICKLES, ROTH, BUMPERS, ZORINSKY, TRIBLE, MELCHER, HOLLINGS, NUNN, PRESSLER, ARMSTRONG, and CHILES are now sponsoring the bill.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope we can clean up this area of the tax law. It is my hope that once this is done, we can close the last chapter of this book once and for all.

At this point, Mr. President, I think a brief history of the problem would be helpful.

In late 1983, various proposals were made to limit the tax benefits—the investment tax credit and accelerated depreciation—associated with using a luxury car in your trade or business. The most prominent of these proposals was to limit the basis—cost—that could be taken into account in computing the investment tax credit and accelerated depreciation. In fact, this type of proposal was ultimately adopted. In the Tax Reform Act the ITC was capped at $1,000—regardless of the purchase price of the car—and annual depreciation deductions were limited—$4,000 the first year, and $6,000 for each succeeding year. Additionally, changes were made in the rules dealing with how these credits and deductions were substantiated. Prior to the 1984 act, local travel was generally governed by the provisions of section 162 of the Tax Code dealing with expenses incurred in carrying on a trade or business. In the act, local travel, along with other "listed property"—like computers and other equipment where personal use might be involved—were made subject to the substantiation rules of section 274. Before the 1984 act, the provisions of section 274 generally applied to travel and entertainment expenses. That section contained much more detailed recordkeeping requirements. In fact, in the 1984 act, section 274 was made even tougher in that the requirement of adequate records was expanded to included "contemporaneous" records. Finally, Mr. President, in the 1984 act, changes were made that dealt with how employer-provided vehicles were to be treated for fringe benefit purposes.

After many complaints from our constituents about the very detailed and onerous recordkeeping required for purely local travel, bills were introduced in early 1985 to repeal the requirement that contemporaneous records be kept to substantiate these deductions and tax credits. A bill was passed by the House that repealed the contemporaneous requirement, and made further cutbacks on the ITC and ACRS deductions that could be claimed on vehicles. In the Senate, legislation was also adopted, but our version was better than the House bill. On the Senate floor, we adopted an amendment by the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. WALLOP, which eased these rules in both the recordkeeping and fringe benefit areas. Unfortunately, many of the provisions added by the Senate were dropped in conference with the House. The regulations that were ultimately issued to implement these proposed changes virtually required contemporaneous, written records. This is the only practical way to meet the regulations under section 274.

Mr. President, I submit that this wasn't the intent of Congress when we acted last year. For this reason, I introduced S. 2090. The bill basically tells the Treasury to "go back to the drawing board." The regulations, as proposed, are very complex, are more stringent than intended by Congress, and in my opinion should be nullified. If any Member of the Senate has any question about the complexity of the proposed regulations, I suggest that the November 6, 1985, edition of the Federal Register be consulted. The proposed regulations are very detailed and complex.

It seems to me that before we allow any regulations to go into effect we should have an extensive review of this area. Requiring small businesses, farmers, and others in the State of Arkansas and other States to keep these records was not what we intended. A moratorium is an efficient way to prohibit these proposed regulations from going into effect. Further, the bill provides that no regulations can be issued during this moratorium period.

Mr. President, I hope this moratorium on the regulations can be approved by the Senate in the very near future. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of S. 2090 be printed in the RECORD.

The text of the bill follows:

A BILL To provide that the Internal Revenue Service may not before July 1, 1987, enforce its regulations relating to the tax treatment of the personal use of vehicles, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. MORATORIUM ON ENFORCEMENT OF VEHICLE REGULATIONS.

(a) SUBSTANTIATION REQUIREMENTS.—The substantiation requirements of section 274(d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to deductions for business use of a vehicle during the moratorium period shall be applied—

(1) without regard to Temporary Regulations § 1.274-5T and § 1.274-6T or any regulation, ruling, or decision reaching the same result as, or a result similar to, such temporary regulations, and

(2) with regard to the regulations in effect under section 274(d) of such Code as in effect before the enactment of the Tax Reform Act of 1984.

Paragraph (1) shall not apply to use of a qualified nonpersonal use vehicle (within the meaning of section 274(i) of such Code).

(b) INCLUSION IN INCOME.—The determination under section 61 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 as to the amount includible in gross income with respect to the personal use of an employer-provided vehicle during the moratorium period shall be made without regard to Temporary Regulation § 1.61-2T or any regulation, ruling, or decision reaching the same result as, or a result similar to, such temporary regulation.

(c) PROHIBITION ON ISSUANCE OF REGULATIONS.—The Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate shall not issue during the moratorium period any regulations with respect to the substantiation requirements described in subsection (a) or the determination described in subsection (b).

(d) MORATORIUM PERIOD.—For purposes of this section, the term "moratorium period" means the period beginning on January 1, 1986, and ending on June 30, 1987.

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I come before the Senate today to address a Government-created problem which has unnecessarily complicated the lives of millions of Americans who drive employer-provided vehicles or make business use of their own.

When the 98th Congress passed the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, we added to the legislation several tax provisions relating to the business and personal use of vehicles. The regulations issued by the Treasury Department to implement the directives almost immediately raised eyebrows and angry voices all across the country. Wyoming farmers and ranchers, energy and construction workers, and salesmen and computers beat a path to my office door to tell me of their frustration in trying to comply with the outlandish new regulations. In past years, a taxpayer claiming business deductions for use of a vehicle had only to maintain adequate records demonstrating the business use of his car or truck, or provide ample evidence that the auto was indeed used for business purposes. Under the interpretation of the IRS, the Deficit Reduction Act required that a detailed log be kept of all business and personal use of a vehicle, or no deduction or credit would be allowed at tax time. In addition to having to schlepp around with a record book in their cars, Americans would have to be prepared to pay taxes on any unaccountable miles which the IRS might deem as personal use.

The uproar caused by this new recordkeeping requirement lit a fire in my home State of Wyoming, and at the urging of myself and a few of my clear-thinking colleagues, Congress voted to repeal the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements, which caused the law to require employees to report and pay taxes on the value of the personal use of their company cars, no matter how insignificant.

The Treasury Department, in a quest for additional revenues and in conjunction with the IRS, re-released its temporary recordkeeping regulations, which went into effect on January 1 of this year. While the regulations have been reissued and supposedly cleaned up, taxpayers are being advised that in order to be safe at tax time, they must still keep a detailed logbook for the whole year. And, they must now contend with the additional burden of answering half a dozen questions on their tax forms regarding the use of their vehicles and the records they kept, questions which go far beyond what I believe to be the intent of Congress. As I warned here on the Senate floor last summer, we have not solved the problem.

A Wyoming stockgrower rises before the Sun to drive his feed truck out to the herd. After breakfast he takes his family car into town to buy supplies and visit his banker and get a haircut. It is unreasonable to expect him to keep a log which differentiates between insignificant personal use and business use of his vehicle which occur in the same trip. A penalty for failing to follow this logging requirement to the letter adds insult to injury.

For all Americans affected by these illogical regulations, I rise today, joining with Senator PRYOR to introduce legislation to declare an 18-month moratorium on the authority of the IRS to enforce the temporary and proposed regulations regarding substantiation of business use of personal vehicles, and similarly suspending IRS enforcement of employer-provided vehicle taxation. In addition this bill will prohibit the IRS from issuing additional regulations in both areas.

Since being reported, these new regulations have created confusion and caused great expense for businesses, employees, tax consultants, and legislative correspondents alike. It is my belief that our best means of alleviating this confusion will be to delay the effective date of the proposed rules, and rethink our automobile expense substantiation needs and come up with a simpler, more fair way of dealing with the issue, and I invite the support of my colleagues.

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, when I received the following letter from a CPA in Iowa, I knew that somehow Congress' good intentions had run amok.

JANUARY 14, 1985.

Senator CHARLES GRASSLEY,
Russell Senate Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CHUCK: In recent years the income tax laws have included rewards and penalties directed toward social objectives. Among the many examples would be the incentives of rehabilitation credits for older buildings and the punitive disallowance of demolition costs or write-off of the undepreciated basis of historic structures.

The Deficit Reduction Act of 84 eased the tax problems of divorce while restricting the tax benefits of business use of automobiles, particularly luxury automobiles. With respect to the tax aspect of divorce, there is no longer a tax on the division of property pursuant to a divorce and alimony is easier to deduct. One might conclude that divorce is good and automobiles are evil!

For my part, I would prefer a new automobile to a new wife. My reasons are simple:

1. A new automobile is less expensive than a new wife—especially if you choose a luxury model.

2. When you get a new auto, you have the choice of keeping the old one around in case you have become sentimentally attached to it, or just want an extra.

3. In selecting a new auto, there is a much wider choice of optional accessories and new gadgets to choose from.

In any event, happy recordkeeping. If you need more autologs, please let me know.

In response to the wisdom expressed by the CPA and farmers, salesmen, public sector employees, repairmen, and assorted other taxpayers, one of the first pieces of legislation passed by this Congress was the repeal of the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements for business automobiles. The Treasury Department was left to determine a workable standard for implementing the substantiation requirements. After issuing three different versions of the regulations since the passage of the original rules in the 1984 Deficit Reduction Act, perhaps it is time for Congress to admit what is obvious to millions of taxpayers across this country. The burden is simply to great in terms of the time, the busy work and the headache for individuals and businesses to justify the dollars raised in tax revenues.

While I am not optimistic that anything short of complete repeal of these regulations will solve this problem, I am willing to let the Treasury Department continue to try and write a reasonable set of rules. Therefore Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. PRYOR, and Mr. BOREN in introducing S. 2090 which provides that the IRS may not enforce its regulations relating to the tax treatment of the personal use of vehicles prior to July 1, 1987.●

HENRY OSSIAN FLIPPER DAY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise this afternoon, as countless Federal, State, and local efforts are under way across the country in recognition of the contributions of black Americans, to highlight the contributions of Henry Ossian Flipper by expressing my support for Senate Resolution 105, introduced by my good friend and colleague from Georgia, Senator MATTINGLY, This resolution recognizes the contributions and achievements of Henry O. Flipper as one of America's outstanding black citizens, a man whose patience and strength of character, whose courage in the face of adversity, and whose service to his country were precedents for all of us to follow.

The story of Henry Flipper begins just prior to the Civil War, a story retold numerous times on film. We all know that the climate of racial strife during the mid-1800's was extremely heated, but there were none more familiar with that fact than Henry Flipper. Henry was born into slavery in 1856, at a time when racial conflict and turmoil had nearly reached the boiling point. Not long after, it did. But Henry was a man who loved his country and would not let the scars of the Civil War temper his zeal to serve his country. Shortly after the Civil War, Henry dedicated his life to military and civil service.

Henry Flipper was admitted to the U.S. Military Academy in 1873, and, although a handfull of black cadets had joined before him, Henry was the first to endure the full course of prejudice and painful adversity fellow students had to offer. In 1877, he became the first black graduate of West Point. Those who knew him at the Academy revered him; the applause he received at the graduation ceremony is testimony to that fact. As the Regular Army's first black officer, Lieutenant Flipper distinguished himself in the field.

As a direct result of the evils of racial prejudice, however, Lieutenant Flipper was court-martialed. He spent the next 36 years of his life fighting his charge, but never did he hold his trials and tribulations as the fault of his country. Lesser men would have thrown in the towel; Henry Flipper, however, was blazing his way into our history books because he did not quit, and we shall always remember how he continuously rose higher than his pitfalls set him back.

In 1891, 9 years after his court-martial, Henry Flipper successfully represented the town of Nogales, AZ, before the court of private land claims. He subsequently was appointed to the Justice Department as a special assistant before the court of private claims. His distinguished tenure is marked by many successes, including sparing the U.S. Government the loss of thousands of acres of disputed Southwestern land.

Later, at the call of his friend from New Mexico, Senator Fall, who became the Secretary of the Interior under President Harding, Lt. Flipper was appointed as his special assistant at the Interior Department. At that time, Henry O. Flipper's position made him one of the highest ranking blacks in the U.S. Government.

Mr. President, this recounting of Henry Flipper's achievements is a small tribute to a man who deserves our utmost respect and admiration. He was a man in love with his country.

Others would have been filled with hatred had they encountered a fraction of his obstacles, but not Henry Flipper. He fought hatred with love, he fought adversity with perserverance and determination, and he fought seemingly insurmountable odds with patience.

We understand this today. That is why Henry Flipper was exonerated of his court-martial by President Ford. His remains were moved from his grave in Atlanta and reinterred at his birthplace, Thomasville, GA, where he was given a burial with full military honors. Henry O. Flipper's qualities are remembered each May at West Point when, to encourage others to follow his lead, a member of the graduating class is awarded the Henry O. Flipper Award. This award is presented to the cadet who best exemplifies the attributes of the man whose service to his country are precedents we all should follow.

Mr. President, I believe Mr. MATTINGLY's resolution deserves our unbending support. Senate Resolution 105 designates March 21, 1986, the 130th birthday of Henry Flipper, as "Henry Ossian Flipper Day." I urge my colleagues to join with those who already have cosponsored Senate Resolution 105 to ensure its speedy passage.●

THE CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 2453, A BILL TO AMEND THE OLDER AMERICANS ACT

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, this conference report concerns a bill which I introduced in the Senate as S. 1858 on November 19, 1985, and was reported by the Committee on Labor and Human Resources on December 17, 1985 and passed by the Senate on February 5, 1986. I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on November 19 a lengthy explanation of, and justification for, this bill. I placed a second statement in the RECORD on February 5, 1986 to update my colleagues on developments affecting the program which this bill, if passed and signed into law, will affect; namely, the Surplus Commodities Program authorized by the Older Americans Act and administered by the Department of Agriculture.

The bill accepted by the conference of the two bodies of the Congress is essentially the same as the original S. 1858. In conference one provision of the bill was deleted, a provision which would require that the Department of Agriculture make regular notification of the possibility that the cents per meal reimbursement in the program would be reduced. The Senate receded to the House on this item in the face of arguments that the Department already makes good faith efforts to do this. No House amendments were accepted.

The bill the Senate is now considering would therefore: First, freeze the cents per meal reimbursement level which the Department of Agriculture is required to provide at 56.76 cents per meal; second, authorizes $127.8 million for fiscal year 1985. And $144 million for fiscal years 1986 and 1987; and third, requires the Department of Agricuture and Health and Human services to provide information to the Older Americans Act Network which would enable it to take better advantage of the bonus commodities programs of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, in conclusion I would just like to say that passage of this bill indicate that the U.S. Senate considers this food program for mostly need older people to be a high priority, and that this is not an appropriate time to reduce the number of meals that our Older Americans Act Network can make available to them.●

THE 74TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE GIRL SCOUTS

● Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I rise today to honor the 74th anniversary of the Girl Scouts of the U.S.A. Last month we observed the 76th anniversary of the Boy Scouts of America. All Americans should take pride in the achievements and accomplishments of the members of these key youth organizations.

When Juliette Gordon Low organized the first troop of Girl Scouts near her home in Savannah, GA in 1912, one-half of our population, women, were relegated to second class status in society. Low was a colorful iconoclast personality who had gone trout fishing in formal wear with Rudyard Kipling, forged iron, and fine tuned her talents as a poetess. She wanted to help young American women broaden their spheres of experience and teach them that they could have an education, a career, and a family.

As a result, close to 3 million girls presently learn both life skills and personal values in the organization—guided by some 500,000 adult leaders. These leaders carry on a program established to instill in our Nation's young women the values of the Girl Scout promise, the Girl Scout law, and five areas of interest—people, well-being, the arts, the outdoors, and today and tomorrow. Juliette Low created an organization through which the promise of young American girls could be fulfilled.

For fulfilling the dreams and hopes of millions of women, both here in America and abroad, I salute Juliette Gordon Low and all former and current Girl Scouts on the occasion of their 74th anniversary.●

AMENDMENT OF THE EXPORT TRADING COMPANY ACT

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a recently issued GAO report entitled "Export Promotion: Implementation of the Export Trading Company Act of 1982." The finding of the report confirm the need for changes to the Export Trading Company Act, as proposed in my bill, S. 1934, which would facilitate further expansion of export trading companies [ETC's].

At the time of passage of the act in 1982, there were high hopes for the success of the legislation. In my judgment, the act represented a major step in the evolution of our antitrust and bank regulation laws. The act clearly delineated circumstances under which banks could engage in nonbanking businesses which had previously been off limits under the Glass-Steagall Act. This step opened up an entire sector of international, trade-related activities to banks where there was a great need for their participation and without prejudicing the safety and soundness concerns that have characterized our bank regulatory policies for the past 50 years.

With respect to antitrust questions, the act clarified existing antitrust laws and enforcement policies by drawing a clear line, in the form of a certificate, between what export activities were permitted by the law and what were not. This approach provides clearer guidance to exporters than was previously available.

Despite these landmark changes, the act has not turned out to be as big a success as some had predicted. At the end of 1985, there were 38 approved ETC's, with 59 certificates of review granted and 7 pending. This is not disappointing only 3 years after enactment. What has been more disappointing is the limited growth and success these entities have had. Most of them continue to be small, and many have had to limit their initial ambitious plans. Furthermore, as GAO noted in testimony on its report before the Subcommittee on Commerce, Consumer, and Monetary Affairs of the House Government Operations Committee, despite improvement in the export environment over the last year, ETC activities have actually declined.

The biggest obstacle has been the appreciation of the dollar and the ballooning of our trade deficit, which occurred at precisely the time the Export Trading Company Act was coming into effect and made it difficult to export under any circumstances. Healthy, growing ETC's no doubt could have survived that kind of challenge, but banks and others new to exporting faced with such sharply adverse international economic conditions have been deterred from going into the business or have been unable to grow to the extent necessary.

Beyond the dollar, however, there are some other problems in the act that have retarded ETC development. Some of them are unintended results of the original legislation; others were predicted by some of us at the time but were accepted anyway as the price of compromise. Three years of experience have given us a better understanding of exporting, a more realistic view of what ETCs are able to accomplish, and how best to design legislation to enhance those possibilities.

The bill I introduced on December 12, the Export Trading Company Amendments Act of 1985, S. 1934, makes five changes in the banking provisions of the ETC Act.

DEFINITION OF EXPORT TRADING COMPANY

The original ETC Act requires approved ETC's to be "organized and operated principally for purposes of exporting goods or services produced in the United States * * *" "Principally" was construed in legislative history and subsequently in regulation to mean that more than 50 percent of the ETC's income must come from exports. This has proved to be a significant constraint on ETC activity because of their need to engage in importing and their desire to enter into third country transactions which involve neither exports nor imports from the United States. Obviously, no company can engage only in one-way trade and expect to function successfully over the long term. The very concept of trade implies goods and services flowing in two directions. Thus, some degree of importing activity is inevitable in any successful ETC. At the same time, however, many companies have found that there are opportunities throughout the world for an ETC to facilitate trade between two or more countries outside the United States. For example, the sale of Indonesian rice to Algeria would be an example of third country trade that does not impact on the United States trade balance but provides profit opportunities for American ETC's.

At present, however, such transactions effectively count as imports in the Federal Reserve Board's periodic calculation of whether an ETC is meeting this test, since income from exports is effectively measured against—and must exceed—income from all other sources. While I believe ETC's should facilitate exports, it is equally clear that we should not constrain them from entering into third country transactions that have no adverse effect on our trade balance.

Accordingly my bill amends the act to provide that "principally" means an excess of export-related income over import-related income, thereby excluding third country transaction income from the test entirely. This will make it easier for ETC's to continue to meet the definition of export trading company, and it will encourage them to enter into these kinds of transactions, which will provide both present income as well as future business opportunities which might well include direct exports from the United States.

Another problem with the definition of export trading company lies in an erroneous interpretation of the 1982 legislation by the Federal Reserve Board relating to the export of services. The Board interpreted the legislation to preclude counting the export of services produced by the ETC itself or an affiliate as export-related income for purposes of the definition. Effectively this prevents an ETC from setting up a division abroad that provides services. This interpretation is contrary to our intent when we wrote the law and an unwarranted and unnecessary constraint on ETC activity. The new definition in my bill also corrects this problem.

ETC RELATIONS WITH AFFILIATES

Along with limits on bank lending to affiliates, section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act defines collateral requirements that must be met when institutions like ETC's borrow from affiliated banks. These limits vary depending on the type of collateral used, but the nature of ETC's is such that in most cases collateral would consist at least in part of accounts receivable; in which case the requirement is 120 percent of the loan or extension of credit. This has proved to be an unnecessarily onerous requirement, particularly for ETC's in their startup phase, which at the present time includes practically all of them. With few accounts receivable, at least in the beginning, little financing capital of their own, and limited access to commercial paper, the collateral requirement puts ETC's at a significant disadvantage.

The simplest solution, which is contained in this bill, is to exempt ETC's from the requirements of section 23A. This change would not affect bank safety and soundness, since the quantitative limits on bank extensions of credit to ETC's in the ETC Act would remain.

LEVERAGE AND INVENTORY

The remaining two sections of the bill concern two issues raised in the Federal Reserve Board's regulations. The Board has rendered an excessively conservation to bank safety that ETC's pose, but which has been a significant disincentive to ETC formation over the past 3 years.

The first provision would change the Board's requirement that ETC's proposing an assets-to-equity ratio of more than 10 to 1 must have their application considered in Washington rather than approved at the regional Federal Reserve bank. This regulation has had the chilling effect of telling prospective ETC's that a proposed ratio of greater than 10 to 1 will encounter considerably more bureaucratic difficulty, delay, and expense.

While I do not oppose the establishment of a desirable ratio as a guideline to be considered in reviewing ETC applications, I believe that 10 to 1 is unrealistic. A more appropriate level, in view of what is common practice in other countries, would be 25 to 1. That is what S. 1934 proposes in the form of a general specification that the Board may not disapprove an application solely on the basis of a proposed assets to equity ratio, unless that ratio is greater than 25 to 1.

The second regulatory amendment would change the Board's requirement that proposals to permit an ETC to hold inventory in excess of $2 million also be referred to Washington. That requirement sends the same negative signal as the regulation on leverage ratios. It is also particularly burdensome since $2 million is an extraordinarily low amount, particularly as ETC's begin to expand. A better approach, in my judgment, is to move away from this kind of arbitrary standard, at least as it is applied across-the-board to all ETC's. In some cases $2 million may be an appropriate limit to adequately protect bank safety; in other cases it may not. The best approach would be to tie such a limit, if it is to be imposed at all, to the circumstances of a particular case, and to the extent that it would effect safety and soundness of the affiliated bank. Therefore, the provision in S. 1934 would prohibit the Board from imposing by regulation a dollar limit on inventories except on a case-by-case basis as just described.

These five changes address the most obvious problems that have occurred in the 3 years since enactment of the legislation, but of course by themselves they will not lead to the creation of thousands of new ETC's. That can occur only if the disincentives to ETC formation represented by the overvalued dollar and the generally difficult situation for American exports over the past 3 years changes. These issues are addressed in other legislation—notably S. 1860, the Trade Enhancement Act, now sponsored by 35 Senators. S. 1934, however, will remove some built-in disincentives to ETC formation, will clarify current law, and in the process will send a clear signal to the Federal Reserve Board that Congress intends an interpretation of this law that will encourage, rather than discourage ETC formation.

The GAO reports on ETC's strongly supports a number of the above points regarding the current law, and provides convincing evidence of a need for the changes included in S. 1934. I ask that a portion of the GAO report be printed in the RECORD.

CONCERNS THAT REGULATIONS WILL AFFECT ETC PERFORMANCE

A major concern is the degree to which bank ETCs are regulated. Bank ETCs believe that certain provisions of the Act and certain Federal Reserve Board regulations and policies have affected or will affect their export performance, potential to compete with foreign-owned trading companies, and ability to survive. Of particular concern are the provisions that bank ETCs (1) must engage exclusively in international trade, (2) must meet the requirement that 50 percent of their total revenues from all sources be derived from exporting, (3) cannot invest in firms that export services, (4) must observe the same collateral requirements as non-bank affiliates when borrowing from parent banks, and (5) must have a leveraging, or asset-to-capital, ratio not greater than 10 to 1, thereby limiting the amount that can be borrowed. The Board's collateral requirements and the leveraging ratio are intended to protect the solvency and soundness of banks.

The Export Trading Company Act itself requires that bank ETCs engage exclusively in activities related to international trade. The Federal Reserve Board views its definition of exports and the 50-percent requirement impose by its regulations as necessary to carry out the intent of the legislation, which is to promote exports. Regarding the export of services, the Board reasons that its restriction that bank ETCs serve only as export facilitators is sufficiently supported by the Act's purpose and the legislative history. The Department of Commerce disagrees with the Board regarding the restriction on the export of services. Commerce contends that both the statute and the legislative history clearly indicate that Congress intended that a bank could invest in an ETC which exports goods or services or which facilitates the export of goods or services of others by providing export trade services.

Two of these issues seem particularly important to us, and since receiving agency comments we have given additional consideration to them. With regard to the required extent of export revenues, we believe the Board clearly is authorized to establish the requirement that more than 50 percent of revenue be from exports. The term "principally" in the context of the statutory provision contemplates that the preponderance of an ETC's activity will not be imports, and the legislative history on the House side anticipates the Board's measuring an ETC's activities in terms of revenue shares. The Board acted within its authority by defining "principally" only in terms of export revenues and in setting the requirement that exports be more than 50 percent of all revenues.

The statute, however, does not itself address how such revenues should be calculated or whether revenue should be the sole basis for determining if an ETC is organized and operated principally for the purpose of exports. In fact, it does not even include the term "revenue." Therefore, for calculations to meet the 50-percent requirement we believe the Board could redefine its own term "revenues" to include only proceeds from imports to and exports from the United States. This change would exclude, for purposes of establishing whether an ETC meets the 50-percent requirement, the proceeds from foreign products sold in overseas markets that do not enter U.S. commerce. The Board could also devise indices additional to "revenue" to determine whether a company is "organized and operated" principally for exporting or facilitating exports and it could extend beyond 2 years the period during which qualifying revenues are computed. We believe such modifications could have the effect of reducing the extent to which companies view the current regulation as a potential impediment to operations and still assure that importing does not constitute the preponderance of ETC activity.

With regard to the agencies' interpretations of the Export Trading Company Act as it relates to export of services, we believe that Commerce's position is the better interpretation of the statute and its legislative history. In our view, the definition of export trading company in Title II of the Act permits bank holding company investment in an ETC which exports services.

Legislation currently before the Senate, S. 2934, the "Export Trading Company Amendments Act of 1985," would make changes to address these and other matters. The bill addresses computation of the Board's 50-percent requirement by proposing to amend the Act to provide that a company qualifies as an ETC when its export revenues exceed its import revenues. The intended effect is to exclude from the calculation of revenues those third-party transactions involving neither exports to nor imports from the United States. Also, the bill would clarify that a bank holding company may invest in an ETC which exports services and that revenue from the export of services produced by an ETC itself or an affiliate counts as export income.●

CHILD IMMUNIZATION

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of legislation, S. 1917, introduced by my distinguished colleague from New Jersey [Mr. BRADLEY]. I commend his recognition of the importance of child immunization, and I wholeheartedly support a U.S. commitment to universal immunization.

S. 1917, the Universal Child Immunization Act of 1986, increases the funding of the child survival fund by $50 million, from $25 to $75 million, in order to assist nations in the development of locally sustainable delivery systems capable of immunizing their own children. With the help of this money, children around the world will be immunized by 1990.

The lack of adequate immunization directly affects the lives of children around the world—3.5 million children still die annually from polio, measles, whooping cough, diptheria, tetanus, and tuberculosis. All of these diseases can be prevented by vaccines. In addition, 3.5 million additional children who survive these diseases are left—scarred for life—with a physical or mental handicap or are permanently weakened to the point of becoming prime targets of malnutrition and diarrhea.

Without action, more than 2.5 million children will be permanently disabled by polio and 20 million children will die from measles. These are unnecessary ailments and deaths. We can prevent these tragedies from occurring with just a small amount of effort on our part.

Currently, the Third World provides 80 percent of the resources necessary for universal immunization. This clearly indicates that the Third World has made a commitment to its own health. Italy has supported that commitment by donating $100 million to UNICEF for immunization activities. Now it is time for the United States to get involved.

A U.S. investment will mean great savings to the Third World in the long run. In the Ivory Coast, every $1 spent on immunization saves $20 in medical and rehabilitation costs. At a time when the United States has a great investment in the long-term future of the Third World, promoting cost efficient health should not be ignored.●

ADVANCE NOTIFICATION PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. The official notification will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that such a notification has been received.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of this advance notification at the office of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room SD-423.

The notification follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, March 11, 1986.

In reply refer to: I-01201/86ct.

Dr. M. GRAEME BANNERMAN,
Staff Director, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC

DEAR DR. BANNERMAN: By letter dated 18 February 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b)(1) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notifications related to missiles and support equipment, which will be forwarded under a single transmittal.

The Department of State is considering offers to a Middle Eastern country tentatively estimated to cost $50 million or more.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST, Director.●

RADIO AND TELEVISION COVERAGE OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I submit for printing in the RECORD three editorials in connection with radio and television coverage of Senate proceedings.

The editorials follow:

[From the Kingsport Times-News, Mar. 7, 1986]

TV MAY GIVE SENATE SOME ADDED INCENTIVE

After years of procrastination, the U.S. Senate has finally decided to allow broadcast of Senate proceedings on a trial basis beginning June 1. And that's good news for those Americans who enjoy watching the deliberations of federal lawmakers. The House has televised its proceedings for years.

Some opponents of Senate TV coverage fretted that cameras could turn the Senate into a showboat. Others worried that TV, coupled with the Senate's lack of tight time limits on speeches, would spur senators to drone on interminably. Still others insisted that cameras would end the Senate's days as a slow, deliberative body by forcing it into the fast-paced world of TV drama.

But once the cameras are in place, senators likely will discover what House members have known for years; that TV coverage can be an important way to teach the public how Congress works—and a strong pressure to make it work better.

[From the Nashville Tennessean, Mar. 8, 1986]

A RED LIGHT FOR THE U.S. SENATE

Members of the U.S. Senate decided last week that it was time they took a little screen test.

At long last, the Senate voted to allow radio and television broadcast of its sessions on a trial basis. The House of Representatives has been broadcasting its sessions since 1979.

Radio broadcasts of the Senate will begin as soon as the equipment is installed, which should take only a few days. Closed-circuit television broadcasting to Senate offices is scheduled to begin on May 1. On June 1, television coverage will be made available to any of the commercial or cable TV networks.

But this is just a test. The trial period ends July 15, at which time the senators will decide whether or not to continue either TV or radio broadcasting.

Tennessee senators deserve a lot of credit for getting this legislation approved. When former Sen. Howard Baker became Majority Leader in 1981, he said broadcasting Senate proceedings was his top priority. He sponsored broadcast legislation four consecutive years, but although he was an extremely powerful and popular Majority Leader, he couldn't persuade his colleagues to approve the measure.

When Mr. Baker left the Senate, his successor, Sen. Albert Gore, Jr., adopted the crusade. Senator Gore was serving in the House when it began broadcasting its session, so he was able to speak from experience about any effect it might have on the upper chamber. He also sweetened the legislation for the senators by throwing in the closed-circuit system, which will allow the senators to monitor Senate action from their offices.

The opponents of this measure are concerned that senators will play to the camera instead of keeping their minds on Senate business. Surely the members of what is often called the world's greatest deliberative body are mature enough to resist that temptation. But if that turns out to be the case, the public can always discern the actors from the statesmen—and the public can always turn the dial.

[From the Chattanooga Times, Mar. 7, 1986]

THE TELEVISED SENATE

After years of talking about it, the U.S. Senate is about to move into the television age. By a 67-to-21 vote last week, the Senate agreed to a two-month test period of radio and television coverage of its proceedings. Radio coverage has begun already; the television cameras start work May 1.

At first, television coverage will be limited to a closed-circuit arrangement, with proceedings transmitted only to Senate offices. On July 1, however, viewing will be expanded for national audiences. The test period will end two weeks later, whereupon the Senate will debate whether to permit permanent radio and TV coverage. The decision shouldn't be hard. The House has allowed live television coverage of its proceedings for more than seven years, with no apparent damage to its character.

Some comments by Sen. Albert Gore of Tennessee, a co-sponor, following the vote bear repeating. Televising the Senate's proceedings "will let people watch government in action, (and) make them better informed (and) more knowledgeable about their government and elected officials. It will renew public interest and decrease cynicism regarding the governmental process."

The proceedings will be carried live on C-Span, a cable network available to 23 million households nationwide. The impact could be considerable because 93 percent of C-Span viewers voted in 1984.

Will the camera's presence change the character of the Senate? Of course it will. But the Senate will survive, just as it survived previous changes, such as the imposition of cloture to shut off filibusters. The televising of Senate debates will inevitably force that body to change the way it does things, even though we may have to suffer the occasional posturing of a senator performing for the cameras or an extended debate on a dull subject.

But that will be outweighed by the fact that television will re-introduce the public to what is often called the "world's greatest deliberative body."

The Senate vote reaffirms the concept that government belongs to the people, and the television camera will reinforce that message. It is exactly what was needed at a time of rampant skepticism about government's efficiency. We applaud the Senate's decision—and the efforts of former Sen. Howard Baker, who worked for years to persuade his colleagues to allow cameras into the Senate chamber. He didn't succeed, but his efforts helped set the stage for last week's vote.●

GENERAL REVENUE SHARING

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, because I believe the word of Congress should be its bond, I am pleased to add my name as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 282, a resolution disapproving of the proposed rescission of the fourth quarter payment under the General Revenue Sharing Program. This proposed rescission, which was included in the President's fiscal year 1987 budget proposal, would eliminate some $760 million in revenue sharing to local governments across the country.

As my colleagues know, the General Revenue Sharing [GRS] Program is unique in its purpose of providing Federal money to local governments for uses to be determined by those governments. By and large, the funds provide needed governmental services ranging from fire and police protection to park maintenance.

The Congress has made a commitment to local governments to fund this program until its current authorization expires at the end of this fiscal year. In turn, local governments have made budget commitments in reliance on expected funding levels from the GRS Program. For the Congress now to renege on that commitment would be unfair, unnecessary, and inappropriate.

Therefore, Mr. President, I cannot support the plan to rescind this appropriation. Dedication to fiscal restraint must go hand in hand with a commitment to equality of sacrifice and fairness. The proposed rescission is neither fair nor equitable. I commend the senior Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] for introducing Senate Joint Resolution 282, and I urge my colleagues to support it.●

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY

RECESS UNTIL 9 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 9 a.m., on Thursday, March 13, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, I ask unanimous consent that there be special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes each: Senators SPECTER, PROXMIRE, HAWKINS, SASSER, and HART.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 10 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following morning business, the Senate will resume the balanced budget resolution. I see the Senator from Colorado is on the floor. The Senator from Michigan, Senator LEVIN, indicated he could be here in the morning at 10 o'clock. Could we proceed with the Senator's amendment tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I am not authorized to really make any representation on behalf of the Senator from Michigan. Yet I do believe that I can say that the Senator from Michigan will not have an amendment to offer. We believe that we have worked out a way in which, hopefully, by 10 o'clock in the morning, will be acceptable to everybody to clarify the questions raised by the Senator from Michigan. The Senator from Michigan, nonetheless, will not agree to my amendment, but he will oppose it cleanly, because he just differs in principle. I would think we would save ourselves a step by avoiding that debate.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Colorado. I did visit briefly with the Senator from Michigan. Senator LEVIN. He felt there was a way to resolve his problem. Then I hope that we could dispose of that amendment. There will be a rollcall request, I understand, by the Senator from Montana, Senator MELCHER, and others. It should require very little debate. We have had extensive debate on that amendment this evening, a couple of hours. Hopefully we could be voting on that amendment by 10:15 or 10:20 tomorrow morning.

Then we have the question of satisfying the distinguished Senator from Alabama on what we might do if we can agree to have final passage on March 25 and how we would be prepared to handle any purely technical amendments that he might discover or might feel necessary to offer at that time. In my view, there must be a way to handle technical amendments. There ought to be some way we could work it out so that it would be satisfactory not only to the Senator from Alabama, but to Senators on the other side, the Senator from Ohio, Senator METZENBAUM, the Senator from Washington, Senator EVANS, and others.

So I am hopeful that we can resolve that to the satisfaction of the Senator from Alabama, because I would like to ask unanimous consent that, following the vote on the Armstrong amendment tomorrow morning, we do go to third reading and put off the final vote until March 25.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. DOLE. I will not make that request now.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would say that we have made some progress and half of my concerns, I believe, can be eliminated by some language that would clarify the presentment to the President of the issue, a limitation of this language of the public debt limit, which is the intent, really, of what the Armstrong amendment is, we could come up with some language if Senator LEVIN and others would eliminate the matter of loans and other matters there.

Assuming that that could be clarified, then the issue, largely, is technical amendments dealing with the word "total" and the carrying of the word "total" as it would be applicable to receipts and outlays throughout the entire amendment.

And if that can be worked out, maybe it can be worked out with a colloquy in which everybody will agree on it. But on the other hand, it may involve the same problem that arose under the Armstrong amendment—the revolving loans, the nonrecourse loans, and the loan guarantees which could become involved there.

So it is a matter of trying to reach a choice of language. I think we pretty well are all agreed on the substance that you do not want to get involved in those types of loans, but that we want to have the language where it would still take care of constitutional amendments to balance the budget on outlays.

But there is the fact that we have a committee report, we have definitions in the committee report, we adopted language that changed the words that were defined, and therefore that causes problems. It is technical but perhaps I think we can reach it, and I will try to work to see if we cannot reach it. It could possibly be done by a colloquy. On the other hand, it might be a technical amendment. But we are dealing with the Constitution. If you make a mistake on it, you have 7 years before you can come back and correct it because it goes to the States for ratification, and stays out there for 7 years before you come back to ratify it.

So I do not want to do something in a hurry just to get along. But I want to be sure that we have adopted the proper language to carry out the intent of the Senate and the Congress.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Alabama. We certainly will attempt to satisfy his just concerns, and I certainly agree. If we can agree on the vote to occur on March 25, then it would be my intention to turn to either the water resources bill, S. 1567, or Senate Resolution 353, committee funding resolutions. There will be at least two or three amendments on the committee funding resolutions. I assume there will be votes on those. Then it is my understanding that there will be a cloture motion filed on the Fitzwater nomination, and there may be an effort to get consent to vote on that—if not tomorrow, on Friday.

So I would suggest that we can expect rollcall votes throughout the day on Thursday, March 13, 1986. It could be a late session.

With that in mind, let me clarify a statement that I made earlier. I left the wrong impression that we had in effect advised Senators that from 6 to 8 not to be concerned, there would not be any votes. I think, first of all, that was generally felt to be the case because we were under the impression that the two remaining amendments on Senate Resolution 225 would be agreed to, then we could agree on final passage to be put over until March 25, and then we would be on the funding resolution which we knew would take some time. I felt fairly safe in at least indicating to the Senators that it looked pretty good from about 6:30 until 8 o'clock.

As it turned out, it demonstrates how wrong you can be because it did not happen. We had debate for 2 hours. But in any event, I would indicate for the record that my message to the distinguished Senator from Florida, Senator HAWKINS, in this case was that in the event there was a vote we would try to give some notice.

I have indicated to the distinguished minority leader that it would be my custom to advise him of any such requests, what action is followed, and maybe if he has any similar requests we would be able to accommodate Members on both sides—not just black out or blank out 2 hours and say no votes but at least give Members who may be unnecessarily away from the Senate some time to return to the Senate before there is a rollcall.

So I want the RECORD to correctly reflect the understanding that I had.

I apologize to the distinguished Senator from Utah, Senator GARN. I believe I indicated to everyone—and no one is ever certain around here—that there could be votes. As it turned out, there was a request for a vote. So we do our best to keep Members on both sides apprised so that they can avoid being here at 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening.

RECONCILIATION

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for his statement that he has just made for the RECORD.

I would like to ask the distinguished majority leader what his plans are with respect to Friday and also with respect to reconciliation. I listened to the distinguished majority leader's statement with reference to the program tomorrow and I do not believe I heard anything pertaining to reconciliation. Will he elaborate thereon at this time?

Mr. DOLE. Let me indicate to the distinguished majority leader—and I was here when the minority leader indicated yesterday morning that he hoped we could move on reconciliation—that I share his view. We have been working with White House representatives to see if we could come together with some package that would satisfy a lot of Senators on both sides of the aisle, plus have it signed by the President.

It does not do too much good to have it vetoed so we are trying to have it signed by the President. There are very important programs—the Tobacco Program, and an 8(c) Program that is very important to the Senator from Indiana and certain other States. We believe we are very close to agreement.

Of course, if that would break tomorrow morning, I would then contact the distinguished majority leader to see if we could bring it up tomorrow sometime.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader. Its passage and signature into law would also represent considerable savings and reduction in the deficit.

Mr. DOLE. That is correct, $18 billion over 3 years. Some of that is revenues, but it is still substantial savings.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Does he expect any rollcall votes on Friday?

Mr. DOLE. I indicated in our policy luncheon Tuesday that I felt that since we were nearing the Easter recess, I would need to correct a misunderstanding that some of my colleagues had. That recess is scheduled to begin at the close of business on Thursday, March 27. I incorrectly stated an earlier date of Wednesday, March 26.

Since we are nearing that date, I would guess there could be rollcall votes on Friday. We would still attempt to complete our business by midafternoon.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

UNITED STATES CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED KINGDOM AND IRELAND

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. KENNEDY, I ask that the House message on H.R. 4329 be read for the first time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 4329) to authorize United States contributions to the International Fund established pursuant to the November 15, 1985, agreement between the United Kingdom and Ireland.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask for second reading.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be held at the desk and read for a second time on our next legislative day.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee for his efforts on the balanced budget amendment. I know that by coming in tomorrow morning we interfere with the scheduled committee meeting the chairman had planned for 10 a.m. I wonder if the distinguished minority leader would have any objection to the Judiciary Committee sitting only to hear nominations at 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I would ask the distinguished majority leader to have a little time to discuss that. Perhaps he could make the request in the morning.

Mr. THURMOND. Since the Senate is going to meet to attend to its work tomorrow morning, it will be necessary for Senators SIMON, SIMPSON, HATCH, and maybe another Senator on the committee to be here in the Chamber. I thought if we could just meet tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock, it would suit the convenience of Senator SIMON and others.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope we will be able to accommodate the distinguished chairman on this side. I cannot do that this evening but I hope I will be able to in the morning.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as I understand, the nominations on the Calendar have not been cleared. Perhaps we could work on some of those tomorrow.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, again, we can take care of that request tomorrow.

RECESS UNTIL 9 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that at 9:01 p.m., the Senate stand in recess until 9 a.m. tomorrow morning, Thursday, March 13, 1986.

The motion was agreed to, and at 9:01 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, March 13, 1986, at 9 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, March 12, 1986

The House met at 3 p.m.

The Reverend Endel Meiusi, general secretary, Estonian Christian Ministries, Denver, CO, offered the following prayer:

Our gracious Heavenly Father, we praise and bless You for the gift of freedom and liberty we enjoy in America. We pray for our President and for our leaders. Give them and especially the Congress, much wisdom in their deliberations and decisions.

Be merciful to all people who are not free. We pray for those in the occupied Baltic nations, Estonia in particular, that they may once again be free of all foreign domination and that free men everywhere would speak out on their behalf.

We thank You that regardless of the outward circumstances, You offer peace and freedom of heart through Your Holy Spirit to those who call upon You.

Help us to continue to put our trust in You, our loving God! Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The SPEAKER. It appears as though something new has been added to the Senate side. This is the first time that the Senate has ever sent over a messenger who is a woman.

So we welcome her here.

A message from the Senate by Mrs. Snowden, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J. Res. 345. Joint resolution to designate March 1986, as "Music in Our Schools Month."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1889. An act to amend title 11 of the United States Code, relating to bankruptcy, to prevent discharge of administratively ordered support obligations;

S.J Res. 205. Joint resolution to designate March 21, 1986, as "National Energy Education Day";

S.J. Res. 273. Joint resolution to designate the week of March 9, 1986 through March 15, 1986 as "National Developmental Disabilities Awareness Week";

S.J. Res. 275. Joint resolution designating May 11 through May 17, 1986, as "Jewish Heritage Week";

S.J. Res. 276. Joint resolution to designate February 19, 1987, as "National Day for Federal Retirees"; and

S.J. Res. 285. Joint resolution to designate the week of May 11, 1986, through May 17, 1986, as "National Osteoporosis Awareness Week of 1986."

On March 10, 1986:

H.J. Res. 409. Joint resolution to direct the President to issue a proclamation designating February 16, 1986, as "Lithuanian Independence Day."

THE REVEREND ENDEL MEIUSI

(Mr. SCHAEFER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, Reverend Meiusi was born in Estonia in 1932. His family was forced to escape from Estonia to Sweden when both Russian and Nazi armies invaded his country during World War II. After time in Sweden and Australia, Reverend Meiusi came to America in 1953 to study theology and psychology and graduated with a bachelor of arts from Southern California College. He continued his studies at other universities and in 1958 was ordained by the Baptist Church in San Francisco.

Pastor Meiusi has served Estonian congregations in Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Sydney, Australia and has pastored Canadian and American Baptist Churches for over 20 years. Since 1953, he has been very involved with Estonian language broadcasting in the United States—an activity he pioneered. In addition, Reverend Meiusi taught at Vancouver Bible College in Canada and has spoken widely in several countries. Currently, Pastor Meiusi serves as the general secretary of the Estonian Christian Ministries with headquarters in Denver, CO, where he has resided for the past 7 years.

The Estonian Christian Ministries presently provides interdenominational shortwave broadcasts 3 days a week from Portugal to listeners throughout Europe, but especially to Soviet-occupied Estonia. These broadcasts are widely listened to in that country as the Estonian people have been largely deprived of their religious and cultural heritage by the illegal Soviet occupation.

This condition is indeed an international tragedy, as 68 years ago last month the independent Republic of Estonia was founded. On February 24, 1918, after centuries of foreign domination, Estonians successfully repulsed invading Bolshevik Russians and asserted their national sovereignty. For the brief period of free statehood, the Republic of Estonia made impressive national progress and was, to a large extent, a model republic.

However, this prosperity and independence was cruelly ended in 1940 by the brutal invasion and illegal annexation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union, under the terms of the infamous Hitler-Stalin Pact. An estimated one-third of the Estonian population was lost in the decade after 1939, most of whom died in Russian labor camps or while defending their homeland. Since the forced incorporation of Estonia, the Soviet Union has undertaken a policy of systematic russification of Estonia, in an attempt to deprive this nation of its proud cultural heritage. Each year, more and more young Estonians are ordered out of their homeland to work in distant parts of the Soviet Union, and increasing numbers of Russians are settling in Estonian territory. Traditional Estonian values are being eroded. This Russian influx, in conjunction with the conscious denationalization of Estonia, threatens the survival of Estonians as a distinct people.

The United States, and most Western nations, has never recognized the illegal incorporation of Estonia and the other Baltic States of Latvia and Lithuania. We must continue to insist that the wish for freedom and independence of the Estonian people be recognized. We must pledge to press the Soviet Union to respect Estonian national and cultural sovereignty.

Reverend Meiusi's efforts are a reminder to us all of the proud heritage of the Estonian people and their deep desire for freedom. I would like to thank him again for his prayer as we all should keep the Estonian people in our thoughts.

THE STANDARD OF LIVING IS BUT A MIRROR OF THE MONETARY STANDARD

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the standard of living of the American people had been improving steadily during the first 190 years of the Republic, benefiting all segments of society, including the poor. After that, our standard of living went into a decline. What is not widely recognized, however, is that the decline of our living standard faithfully mirrors the depreciation of the dollar.

The watershed was the year 1968. It was during that year that President Johnson asked the Congress to repeal speedily what he termed an outmoded law, requiring that every $1 in paper money be backed by 25 cents in gold. When the House of Representatives voted 199 to 190, on February 21, and the Senate voted 39 to 37, on March 14, to repeal the gold reserve requirements against Federal Reserve notes, and the President signed the bill on March 19, they injured this Nation seriously by converting its currency into fiat money. Money is the bloodstream of a nation. Fiat money is the most diseased monetary bloodstream known to mankind. It is a national drug with the ultimate effect of a poison. It is a means and invitation to national catastrophe.

Apart from the more obvious consequences in terms of a deteriorating standard of living, loss of purchasing power of wages and savings, and the loss of control of the public purse, there are other more subtle and intangible social consequences. As money loses value, so do moral and spiritual values decline. Crime and graft mount. Juvenile delinquency increases. Licentiousness spreads. We have been witnessing a general degradation of standards. But the first occurrence, it should be remembered, was the debasement of the monetary standard.

PLEAS FOR DIPLOMACY

(Mr. KLECZKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, first of all, peace in Central America is not brought any closer by the type of Democratic-bashing rhetoric which we've heard recently. Let's bash our enemies, not our own patriots.

Last Friday, President Reagan called on veteran troubleshooter Philip Habib to be his new special envoy to Central America. I welcome this appointment, as the administration's efforts to reach a diplomatic solution to the crisis have been sorely lacking.

However, before we send Mr. Habib on another mission to warmer climates, let's examine some of the baggage he will be bringing with him. Specifically, his arrival coincides with the President's request for $100 million in aid to the Nicaraguan Contras, $70 million of which surely will be for military hardware. That doesn't seem to me to be a very encouraging introduction to the serious negotiations we all know are needed in that region.

Mr. President, let's not just throw another $100 million at this problem—let's actually try to solve it with a truly sincere effort at diplomacy, an effort, I might add, which is supported by all of our NATO, Latin American, and Japanese allies. Mr. President, let Philip Habib do the job you've asked of him.

THE DEFENSE REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1986

(Mr. HOPKINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, in war and peace, two fundamental questions must be asked about America's defense system:

First, is it adequate to deter or defend against foreign aggression; and

Second, is America getting the most effective and efficient military system in return for the massive investment we make in our national defense?

To insure that the answer to both these questions is "yes" the Nichols-Hopkins Defense Reorganization Act of 1986 has been introduced.

This legislation is comprehensive in scope, prudent in the pace with which changes will occur, and historic in effect and purpose.

It represents the first total reorganization of our defense system in 40 years.

If you are interested in perfecting the military chain of command, ending interservice rivalry, improving communication and protection for our front-line troops, and straightening out the procurement mess, we welcome your cosponsorship and urge your support of House Resolution 4370.

PRIVATE SECTOR REQUIRES POLYGRAPH AS A TOOL IN SELECTING EMPLOYEES

(Mr. DARDEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, today we will consider the proper role for the polygraph—commonly known as the "lie detector"—in the screening of employees and job applicants by private industry.

With internal theft costing business—and, ultimately, consumers—billions of dollars each year, the private sector needs the polygraph as one tool in selecting employees for positions of trust. At the same time, we recognize the potential for abuse of the device.

That is why the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG] and I will offer a substitute setting minimum Federal standards for polygraph use—a reasonable alternative, I believe, to denying private industry the right to use this valuable investigative aid.

The Federal Government already considers the polygraph suitable for national security investigations. Private industry should have an equal opportunity to employ this device as one tool of a comprehensive investigation.

FREE, FAIR AND OPEN TRADE WORLDWIDE

(Mr. COATS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, the new numbers are in, and it is more bad news on the trade front. The latest month's trade deficit was $16.5 billion, a staggering number.

But more than the number is staggering. Our trade deficit is staggering in human terms, also, because it shrinks U.S. markets, decreases investment, and causes lost jobs and dislocated families.

It is imperative that Congress address this problem. I have previously called for movement on four fronts, and today I renew that call.

First, we must make trade a top priority. Today I am introducing legislation to elevate trade policy to a top priority by forming a Department of Trade to bring the patchwork of trade regulators and specialists under one agency.

Second, the principle of reciprocity must guide our trade efforts. We must open foreign markets to American goods.

Third, we must vigorously enforce current trade laws where clear evidence exists that foreign nations are violating international law, and strengthen those laws where needed.

Finally, we must get our own house in order by reducing the deficit so that interest rates can continue to fall.

These steps can reverse the trade deficit and bring jobs to millions of Americans.

LET'S STOP THE CONTRA WAR NOW

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, in recent days we have heard some talk of cutting a deal with the administration on Contra aid. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you and commend you for your forthrightness in opposing any such "compromise." The administration proposal is a formula for failure and a formula for war in Central America. Six months' delay and another "promise them anything" won't change that.

Last year Mr. Reagan sent us a letter saying that he was all for negotiation, he was all for Contadora, and he was all for cleaning up human rights violations by the Contras. Many Members of this House, for whom I have the deepest respect, accepted these promises and representations in good faith. What happened? The administration isn't negotiating. It is ignoring Contadora. And the Contras haven't cleaned up their act—they still look to Somoza's old officers for leadership.

Let's not repeat this history.

Military aid is military aid, now or 6 months from now. Now is the time to make a choice. Let's stop the Contra war now.

LET'S WORK TOGETHER TO MAKE GRAMM-RUDMAN WORK

(Mr. DELAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, in the past few weeks we have seen more and more examples of agencies that are trying to discredit Gramm-Rudman by cutting the most visible and popular services instead of finding the fat and waste in their programs. The goal, I believe, is to turn public sentiment against Gramm-Rudman. Gramm-Rudman is not the culprit in these layoffs and certailed service, Government waste is. Recently, I found an example of how Gramm-Rudman should be working. Last week, one of my district staffers came to Washington for research access training at the Library of Congress. She found that classes ended much earlier than expected. When she asked why this was, the response was "Gramm-Rudman." I was disturbed by this reply and so I contacted Congressional Research Service regarding changes in their program. CRS explained that they had cut out the unnecessary parts of their training program. They made changes, and I quote, "To lower the cost of the program without diminishing its quality."

My only regret is that it took Gramm-Rudman to eliminate previously wasteful practices. By taking a hard look at their program, CRS found a way to provide the same high quality training programs we have come to expect. Mr. Speaker, as elected representatives, it is our duty to make sure that all of the bureaucracy takes this same approach. Unfortunately, many of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle are quick to stand behind the cries of agencies which in the past have been largely unaccountable for waste and abuse. Let's work together to make Gramm-Rudman work.

PRESIDENT'S EDUCATION BUDGET, 1987

(Mr. PERKINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, there's a good program in existence today which helps needy students go to college. The Pell Grant Program has widespread support among the people involved in higher education.

I believe that we Members of Congress are given the responsibility to help financially disadvantaged students. These young people are crying out for an opportunity; Pell grants give them a chance to obtain the college education they deserve.

The administration, for reasons hard for me to understand has asked that we take away this opportunity for 816,000 students by cutting the funding for Pell grants by over $800 million. Where will these students turn for the help they need to go to college; 816,000 students are asking for your help.

NICARAGUA

(Mr. RITTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, we are hearing from many different quarters about the situation in Nicaragua. Here is a quarter, perhaps, that is worth listening to. These are the results of a poll taken on March 2 and 3 by the newspaper Le Nacion in San Jose, Costa Rica:

Nicaragua is an agent of Cuba and the U.S.S.R., how many people believe that is true? Ninety-three percent of the population of Costa Rica, the oldest democracy in Central America and South America, believe that Nicaragua is an agent of Cuba and the U.S.S.R.

In Honduras the percentage of people in a democratically elected government that believe that Nicaragua is an agent of Cuba and the U.S.S.R. is 93 percent as well.

In Guatemala, a country removed, the opinion of the people in that nation, with a newly elected democratic government, 80 percent of the people believe Nicaragua is an agent of Cuba and the U.S.S.R.

In San Salvador, 74 percent of the people believe that.

What about the aid to Contras in Nicaragua?

In Costa Rica, 69 percent of the people approve, 24 percent disapprove. In Honduras, 55 percent approve, 25 percent disapprove; in Guatemala, 54 percent approve, 22 percent disapprove; and in San Salvador, 48 percent approve and 19 percent disapprove.

Nicaragua, most widely seen as a military threat. In Costa Rica, 92 percent view Nicaragua as a military threat. In Honduras, 90 percent.

These people are telling the American people something. They are telling the U.S. Congress something. Let us listen.

MEMBERS URGED TO SUPPORT H.R. 1840, THE SATELLITE VIEWING RIGHTS ACT

(Mr. TAUZIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, last week the telecommunications subcommittee held an extensive hearing on the scrambling of satellite television programming to determine whether the marketplace is working or whether we need legislation like the satellite viewing rights bill I have introduced.

We learned through the hearing that the market is not working, that the market is not competitive. In fact, we learned at those hearings that the first programmer to scramble, HBO, has developed an elaborate kickback scheme—which they call a credit—to create a monopoly for sales of its programming.

I learned just this morning that Showtime and the Movie Channel have developed a marketing development allowance that is almost identical to the HBO kickback plan.

The bottom line—both these schemes force satellite dish consumers in a cable franchise area to pay the cable company for satellite TV programs, either voluntarily or involuntarily.

In 1984 Congress deregulated the cable industry because we were told it would operate in a competitive marketplace. But what we see today is a very different picture. It is the picture of a small, but promising competitor being dominated by huge communications conglomerates.

If you want competitive markets, I urge you to support H.R. 1840, the Satellite Viewing Rights Act.

CONRAIL SALE

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, in the very near future Congress will be deciding the fate of Conrail. The stakes for Ohio and other States serviced by Conrail are high should the decision be made to sell to Norfolk Southern. According to some reports, Ohio will suffer 44 percent of all the lost jobs associated with that sale. Think about it. Ohio will lose 44 percent of all those jobs.

Ohio is already No. 1 of the large industrial populated States for unemployment. In my district, mainly the northeastern Ohio-Youngstown area, is No. 1 for unemployment in the State. In addition to that, Ohio is No. 2 for the loss of population of all the 48 contiguous States, second only to Michigan. Michigan lost 5 percent of its total population between 1980 and 1984. We have lost 3 percent; 329,000 people have left Ohio, folks.

Now, on top of other economic tragedies, the sale of Conrail potentially to Norfolk Southern will cost us 800 jobs.

I am asking my colleagues to take a look at this unemployment dilemma in northeastern Ohio and take a look at the sale to Norfolk Southern and give us some relief. My God Almighty, we deserve it.

SATELLITE DISHES

(Mr. TALLON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, the home satellite earth station brought the rural population of this country fully into the mainstream of American culture.

Unfortunately, many of the major satellite program distributors have recently cut-off dish owners by scrambling their signals.

A great many of my constituents must buy expensive descrambling equipment and pay inflated monthly service fees or lose thousands of dollars invested in their satellite dishes.

Any legislative solution to this problem must ensure that descrambling devices will be widely available at reasonable prices on the open market.

Furthermore, a fair system of compensation for satellite programmers must be arranged.

Both dish owners and satellite programmers will profit as program availability increases.

I urge my colleagues to support pending legislation for an orderly transition period during which all affected parties are treated fairly.

FEDERAL FIREARMS LAW REFORM ACT of 1986

(Mr. HUGHES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Judiciary Committee, unanimously—let me repeat, 35 to 0—reported out H.R. 4332, the Federal Firearms Law Reform Act. As that unanimous vote indicates, it is a thoughtful, well-balanced bill that has been carefully drafted to provide real relief to the Nation's sportsmen and hunters without doing damage to the Nation's law enforcement efforts as other legislative proposals would do.

Not only does this bill meet the needs of hunters and sportsmen, for example, to transport their rifles and shotguns for legal sporting activities, but the bill actually strengthens law enforcement in a dozen significant ways.

This bill will help protect the public from violent crime by providing notification to law enforcement about criminals buying guns. Current law requires purchasers of firearms to fill out a form indicating that they are not a criminal or mental incompetent. But we know that a great percentage of criminals lie on these forms—and currently those forms never get to law enforcement. This makes no sense. This bill will enable law enforcement to find armed criminals who have lied when they buy handguns.

The bill bans the sales of silencers, and kits to make silencers.

The bill bans the parts used to convert weapons to machine guns.

This bill provides a 5-year mandatory prison term for carrying a firearm during drug trafficking.

This bill provides a 10-year mandatory prison term for carrying a machine gun during a felony.

Attorney General Meese said today in testimony before our committee that he has no problem with its provisions, that he is comfortable with it, unlike S. 49 which he said should be amended in a number of provisions.

This reasonable and balanced firearms reform bill has been endorsed by the coalition of every major law enforcement organization in the Nation.

This is a good bill. Please take the time to examine it carefully. It merits your support.

THE FUTURE OF THE AMERICAN MACHINE TOOL INDUSTRY IS ON THE LINE THIS WEEK

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, next Monday, March 17, the President will consider the evidence of import penetration of our machine tool industry filed in a 232 petition by the National Machine Tool Builders Association almost 3 years ago.

The finding by the Commerce Department that the machine tool industry of this country needed relief has been languishing at the White House for over 2 years. We hear that one member of the National Security Council has been blocking that decision for that long. One member, appointed—picked by no voting constituency—has a power greater than the Congress who drafted the law, who represents the American people.

In 1 year of that 2-year period, April 1, 1984, to March 31, 1985, the U.S. Department of Defense has obligated $26,693,000 to purchase machine tools abroad. While all this is going on, thousands of persons in the manufacturing end of machine tools in our country have joined the unemployment ranks. This industry may be even more important in an emergency than a strong Navy.

I hope that our American machine tool producers can get some relief from many sources in the next week. We will not be a world leader nor will we be safe unless they are saved.

PERMISSION TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 4151, OMNIBUS DIPLOMATIC SECURITY AND ANTI-TERRORISM ACT OF 1986

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have until midnight tonight to file a report on H.R. 4151, the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask of the gentleman if he can tell us the amount of money that is involved in the bill that he is requesting to file a report on?

Mr. FASCELL. If the gentleman will yield, I have not seen the final tabulation by CBO, but I will tell the gentleman that it encompass everything the President requested. That total package runs for the full course of the 5-year time period it would take to implement it, about $4.4 billion.

Mr. WALKER. A little over $4 billion.

Are we going to have to have any kind of a Gramm-Rudman waiver to bring that bill to the floor?

Mr. FASCELL. No, sir.

Mr. WALKER. So that it will come out purely as an authorization bill; it will not involve any kind of entitlements or so on that would involve a Gramm-Rudman waiver? Is that correct?

Mr. FASCELL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

ARMS SALE TO SAUDI ARABIA

(Mr. LEVIN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the administration's proposal to sell $345 million worth of antiaircraft and antiship missiles to the Saudis is wrong and it doesn't make sense.

It's wrong because the Saudi's still haven't lived up to the bargain that the administration proposed during debate over the 1981 arms sale to Saudi Arabia. The bargain then was that the Saudi's in return for advanced weaponry would work to directly foster the peace process in the Middle East.

But the Saudi's have yet to do any such thing.

Now the administration suggests that we must sell the Saudi's advanced antiaircraft and antiship missiles in order to deter an Iranian threat. Yet the arms are not scheduled for first delivery until 1989. How does that connect to the Iranian's current war offensive? It doesn't make sense.

To offer the Saudi's a long term sale of advanced weaponry while the Saudi's refuse to move forward on a peaceful settlement in the Middle East and while they refuse to even use their influence to work toward the cessation of terrorist activities in the Middle East is to offer all the wrong signals to the Saudi's.

THE APPOINTMENT OF A MURDERER AS AMBASSADOR TO THE UNITED NATIONS

(Mr. BURTON of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I think the appointment of a murderer to be Ambassador to the United Nations should tell us something about the Sandinista regime. Nora Astorga, who was just appointed as Ambassador to the United Nations by the Communist Sandinista Government, is a Sandinista hero because she lured a general to her bedroom and slit his throat. This is what we call murder, and the Sandinistas call "revolutionary justice."

Now we are going to have this woman at the United Nations berating the United States day-in and day-out for crimes against humanity, while the Communist Sandinista regime continues to dispense "revolutionary justice" against the people of Nicaragua. The Sandinistas have burned and tortured priests, massacred the Miskito Indians, have thousands of political prisoners—and she'll be lecturing us on human rights!

Nora Astorga will be feeding the American people a steady diet of misinformation like the phony human rights reports coming out of the Sandinistas law firm, Reichler and Applebaum. It's time this Congress stopped listening to Sandinista propagandists and did what's right. Or else Nora Astorga's "revolutionary justice" will plague the rest of Central America.

SPAIN VOTES TO STAY A MEMBER OF NATO

(Mr. GARCIA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a phone call from some leading authorities in Spain, and it seems that the Spanish people have decided, or it looks that way, and I want to make that very clear, it is not official yet, but it appears that Spain will remain as a member of NATO.

I think that this is significant; I think it is important, and I would like to personally take this floor and be amongst the first to congratulate Felipe Gonzalez, the Prime Minister of Spain.

I would also like to go on to say that the North Atlantic Assembly is very important to the free world. I want to make it clear that NATO is not just an organization of military and political bodies. It is also a committee in which we deal with human rights, we deal with successor generations, we deal with education, and we deal with Radio Free Europe.

So I am delighted that Spain and the Spanish people have taken it upon themselves as it appears to be at this moment to remain as part of the free world and free Europe, and has decided to stay with the North Atlantic Assembly.

INTRODUCTION OF HOUSE RESOLUTION 395—RESOLUTION OF INQUIRY

(Mr. PANETTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, when we voted last year to provide the $27 million in aid to the Contras, we required that the President establish procedures to guarantee that our aid would in fact be used for humanitarian purposes.

Now, the GAO tells us that not only have those procedures not been established, but that they cannot be sure where $7.1 million of this appropriation has gone, and that we cannot even be sure that the Contras in fact are getting the goods supposedly purchased with this money.

The issue here is not one of whether you are for or against aid to the Contras. The issue is not whether you are for one type of aid versus the other. The issue is simply accountability. The issue is whether the law in fact is being carried out.

For that reason, I have introduced House Resolution 395, which is a resolution of inquiry that would require the President to provide the Congress all of the available information as to where this money has gone.

Surely in the very least the public is entitled to these answers as we consider the President's $100 million request. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution of inquiry and to demand that the Congress and the public get these answers.

MISREPRESENTATION OF INTRODUCTION OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 296, PRESIDENT'S BUDGET RESOLUTION

(Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to come to the well of the House to set the record straight in response to a statement made on this floor yesterday by one of my colleagues from the Pennsylvania delegation, Mr. WALKER. I only wish Mr. WALKER had had the foresight to speak with me before he took the floor and misrepresented both the intent and facts of my introduction of House Concurrent Resolution 296.

House Concurrent Resolution 296 is the President's Budget resolution; strictly reflecting the budget as submitted by the President on February 5, 1986. I understand Mr. WALKER claimed that this concurrent resolution "has a deficit figure in it of $159 billion in violation of Gramm-Rudman" and "the President's budget came up with a deficit of $144 billion". House Concurrent Resolution 296 reflected the President's budget as submitted. What Mr. WALKER overlooked is the fact that Gramm-Rudman requires that the budget resolution contain two deficit levels. One, known as the Gramm-Rudman deficit, must take into account Social Security trust fund activities. The other deficit level must be calculated without Social Security receipts and disbursements. The President followed that same directive in his budget (as summarized on page 6-E-7).

Let me clear up another misrepresentation. I do talk about the budget with Members of the other party, including the Republican leadership. It is my hope that we will all be able to work together in the days and weeks ahead once the minority has a better idea of its plans for the budget and once I have had the opportunity to complete my talks with the Democratic membership.

It is my intention that together, in a bipartisan manner, we will be able to present to the House for consideration a budget which fulfills our obligation in meeting the needs of America.

I realize that in the heat of our politically charged atmosphere, a slip of the lip is sometimes unavoidable. But, we all must be ever more diligent to avoid misrepresentations as we answer the call of our most difficult task ahead: the fiscal year 1987 budget.

TEMPORARY EXTENSION OF CERTAIN HOUSING AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 563) to provide for the temporary extension of certain programs relating to housing and community development, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. McKINNEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee to explain to the House in general what we are doing.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Housing and one of the long-time members of the full committee and one of the most constructive and creative members that we have on the committee, to simply say that it is the same extender that we have now for the fourth time asked the House, and accordingly with the Senate, to extend the basic FHA mortgage insurance programs that will expire after the 90-day more-or-less extension that we obtained last December.

This extension would be for and until April 30. It would include an extension also of the other basic programs, such as the Farmers Home Rural Housing authorization and the related programs, all of which we included in the three prior extensions and fundamentally what this means is that we will in a timely fashion preserve some stability in the basic housing finance mortgage markets of this country.

Mr. McKINNEY. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman of the subcommittee for his explanation, and I yield to the ranking member of the full committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE].

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Connecticut for yielding.

I am pleased to support House Joint Resolution 563 legislation to extend certain insuring authorities relating to programs that fall under the jurisdiction of the Banking Committee. These authorities are due to expire next Monday and the resolution would extend them until April 30.

As mentioned by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ], the primary authority that is extended is the insuring authority for FHA programs at the Department of Housing and Urban Development. In addition, the resolution would also extend certain housing programs under the jurisdiction of the Farmers Home Administration and the Flood and Crime Insurance Programs of the Federal Insurance Administration.

Mr. Speaker, I support limiting this extension to April 30 because I hope we will be able to enact the annual housing authorization bill during the interim. I know the Members have heard that statement before but I believe I can sense a new spirit of negotiation and compromise on the part of all parties.

I support extending the authority for all the programs mentioned even though I do not support the reauthorization of the Crime Insurance Program. That issue, however, can best be dealt with in connection with the regular housing authorization legislation.

In the meantime, we will be assuring that these important insuring authorities will continue without a break in service. This is especially important at this time of the year for the FHA Insurance Program. Housing activity is especially strong. With interest rates down many first-time home buyers are getting ready to purchase their first home. This segment of our society is a big user of the FHA program. It must be available when they need it.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of House Joint Resolution 563.

Mr. McKINNEY. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I just would like to say that the less damage we do to the secondary market, the more the red machine can produce thread and I think by having this action in time we are moving ahead in getting it done.

Furthermore, as an Irishman in the House of Representatives of the United States of America, I would like to remind everybody that Monday is St. Patrick's Day and that is a very sad day to have anything expire, except those individuals enjoying green beer and good spirits.

Mr. Speaker, I have a feeling that we want to hear from the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make certain that we have no problems with Gramm-Rudman, no budgetary problems at all by taking this action in this way. We are not using unanimous consent, for instance, to get around any kind of waiver provisions; is that correct?

Mr. McKINNEY. This particular movement today should give the gentleman a sense of deja vu. I think it is, because we have done it and this will be the fourth time. It is a simple extension, no complications, no problems, no hidden nuances, and the chairman of the subcommittee, the ranking member of the subcommittee, and the full ranking member will then go back into their little hot box and wax poetic on a housing bill which hopefully by the end of April will arrive here.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

EMPLOYEE POLYGRAPH PROTECTION ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 337 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 1524.

□ 1545

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1524) to prevent the denial of employment opportunities by prohibiting the use of lie detectors by employers involved in or affecting interstate commerce, with Mr. GONZALEZ in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from California [Mr. MARTINEZ] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. MARTINEZ].

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself as much time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1524, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act, which passed out of my subcommittee and the Education and Labor Committee.

The use of polygraphs has multiplied in the private workplace, and 80 percent of its use has been for the screening of job applicants. Yet, in testimony before my subcommittee by victims of the polygraph, by reformed former polygraphers, by researchers, and by civil liberties and labor groups, we have seen how the polygraph machine is an unreliable tool for detecting truth and dishonesty.

The polygraph machine is basically a machine which measures body temperature, blood pressure, and blood pulse levels to detect stress during questioning by polygraphers. We all know that stress can result from any number of stimuli, including being investigated or accused falsely of wrongdoing.

In addition, the polygrapher plays judge, jury, and God in determining a worker's fate for all future jobs. No one reviews or second guesses a polygrapher's findings, and polygraphers often boast of never having failed to get their man or woman. Merely regulating polygraphers by licensing or requiring bachelor of arts degrees only elevates a voodoo craft into a science.

This bill will prohibit the use of polygraphers in the work force, with exceptions given to the Government sector and in case of national security and the drug industry for people who have access to dangerous drugs. Government bodies will continue to be able to use the polygraph machines for police investigations.

This bill is important, because it protects worker's rights to privacy, to due process, and to the presumption of innocence until some degree of evidence proves them guilty of alleged wrong acts. It is important to emphasize that all courts of law prohibit the use of polygraphs in court as evidence unless stipulated by the parties. In addition, the American Psychological Association opposes the use of polygraphs as a scientifically reliable lie detector instrument.

Employers would be better off if sound auditing and personnel screening practices would be employed which would truly determine the fitness of an individual for employment or continued employment.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, polygraphs have become a big business. An estimated 2 million polygraph examinations are administered each year. Millions of employees have been, and continue to be, judged on the basis of these examinations. Thousands of employers use them for one purpose or another. Yet neither they nor we know for certain how accurate these tests really are. That uncertainty alone was enough to convince me not to cosponsor the bill before us. I did so because I wanted to take a good, hard look at this legislation and the issues it addresses.

The validity of polygraphs was the subject of a 1983 study by the Office of Technology Assessment which found estimates of accuracy ranging from 64 to 98 percent. Overall, OTA found that when used in criminal investigations, polygraphs work better than chance, but have error rates that could be considered significant.

Unfortunately, most studies ascribing high rates of accuracy to polygraphs have been conducted by polygraphers themselves. Asking them to gauge their own validity is a little like asking me to analyze the correctness of my voting record. In both cases, the answer is near perfect. Studies by people who do not make their living from polygraphs have found a substantially lower rate of accuracy.

Some businesses, of course, have testifed that polygraphs are essential to combating theft in the workplace. They maintain that polygraphs are useful in both preemployment screening and in the investigation of a particular incident. Other businesses, however, argue that polygraphs are not useful; that they are not accurate and even counterproductive. These employers have found that if you don't put some trust in your employees, they may do their best to merit your mistrust.

With business divided and science unsure, what should our approach be? Mixed reviews are nothing new to polygraphs, dating back to at least the beginning of this century. Although Congress has confronted the issue only in the past two decades, the courts have been facing it for a good deal longer.

In the leading case on the admissability of polygraphs, Frye v. U.S., (CA DC; 293 F. 1013, 12/3/23), a unanimous U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia rejected the defendant's attempt to introduce the results of a lie detector test. As the court noted, the theory underlying the lie detector "seems to be that the truth is spontaneous, and comes without conscious effort, while the utterance of falsehood requires a conscious effort, which is reflected in blood pressure." In ruling against the admissability of the lie detector, the court wrote that:

> Just when a scientific principle or discovery crosses the line between the experimental and demonstrable stages is difficult to define. Somewhere in this twilight zone the evidential force of a principle must be recognized, and while the courts will go a long way in admitting expert testimony deduced from a well-recognized scientific principle or discovery, the thing from which the deduction is made must be sufficiently established to have gained general acceptance in the particular field in which it belongs.
> We think the systolic blood pressure deception test has not yet gained such standing and scientific recognition among physiological and phychological authorities as would justify the courts in admitting expert testimony deduced from the discovery, development and experiments thus far made.

That decision was rendered over 60 years ago. Does it still hold true? Have polygraphs crossed the line to scientific acceptance?

To be accurate, the instrument discussed in the Frye case apparently only measured blood pressure, whereas today's polygraph also measures breathing and sweating. Despite the addition of these indicia, however, psychological authorities have not improved their opinion of the polygraph.

In fact, a month and a half ago, the American Psychological Association adopted a resolution stating that the evidence of polygraphs' validity remains unsatisfactory, and is particularly poor for employment screening and in dealing with victims of crime. The resolution also warned against the potential for great damage to the innocent people who will be labeled as liars by the polygraph.

Some courts have permitted the introduction of polygraph results, typically with a written agreement by both parties in advance of the examination. However, most courts continue to adhere to the approach in the Frye decision, rejecting the introduction of polygraphs as evidence. Even the Justice Department, which objects to this legislation, opposes the use of polygraph results in criminal trials.

But if the use of polygraphs is generally prohibited by our courts, does it follow that employers should be bound by the same rules? Not necessarily. A personnel office is obviously not a court of law.

However, I do not think that an employee has to leave his or her rights outside the personnel office door, either. Leaving aside the issues of accuracy and admissibility for the moment, what is the personal impact of the polygraph exam?

I don't think there is any question but that polygraphs are intimidating and humiliating. And if they do not actually violate an individual's rights to speech, privacy, and freedom from self-incrimination, they sure come close. The fundamental principles of the Constitution's first, fourth, and fifth amendments are not advanced by the polygraph—in fact, quite the opposite. Yet 2 million people every year are asked to take these tests.

I think all of us have been preaching the virtues of cooperation between labor and management. I know I have, telling business and unions alike that we cannot afford to waste our time, energy, and resources on disputes, and that we must work more as a team, where risks and rewards are shared. Do polygraphs have any place in this drive for labor-management cooperation? The question answers itself. Of course they do not. A workplace run on fear will run fearfully.

But let's bring the issue a little closer to home. Suppose during your reelection campaign this October, your opponent asks you to take a polygraph. You know that it might be 90 percent accurate, or it might be right only 60 percent of the time. Would you take it? Or would you protest that you had done nothing wrong? If you would take it, then by all means oppose this bill. If you wouldn't risk your career on a 10- to 40-percent chance of error, then don't ask 2 million other Americans to take that same risk.

I urge you to join me in opposing the Young-Darden substitute and voting for H.R. 1524.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

My colleagues, this is not a bill to ban the use of lie detectors in America. The purpose of this bill is to limit the epidemic growth of lie detector, polygraph, testing in the workplace. The American Polygraph Association estimates that last year more than 2 million lie detector tests were given. By the way, that number of tests has tripled—tripled—in just the past 10 years.

When Americans hear that last year we gave 2 million lie detector tests, they automatically assume that those tests are being given by the FBI or the CIA or your local police, but the fact is that 98 percent of those 2 million tests were given by private business, and approximately three-quarters of these tests are given for preemployment testing, while the other one-fourth are used for investigations of possible wrongdoing of workers.

This legislation is moderate. It does not place a total ban on the use of lie detectors. It does halt the epidemic growth in them. The bill protects workers who are wrongfully denied employment and whose careers are devastated based on the results of these questionable tests. In fact, tens of thousands of workers are wrongfully denied employment every year, because of the demonstrated and inherent inaccuracies of both these lie detector gadgets and the people who operate them.

Through the years, States have made sporadic efforts to control the use of this gadget. Today, 31 States and the District of Columbia have passed legislation affecting their use in the private work force. However, these separate laws have not proven effective. In fact, they have, ironically, given a false sense of security that the gadget works, and thus, once a State regulates the gadget, the use of the gadget explodes.

Often employers undermine State law by pressuring employees and jobseekers into "volunteering" to take a test even when the State law prohibits requiring or requesting an examination. In States that completely ban the use of lie detectors, employers may avoid the law by hiring in a neighboring State which permits examination and then transferring the employee into the State where such testing is prohibited. It is clear now that State regulation has been perceived as a "seal of approval" on the gadget, thus resulting in the explosive, epidemic rise to 20 million lie detector tests on American citizens each year.

Our criminal justice system presumes that an individual is innocent until proven guilty. The polygraph abuses that principle because it requires one to prove one's innocence. The courts in this country refuse to admit, in most instances, polygraph results as evidence in trials because of the documented inaccuracies of these gadgets and because they, in effect, require testifying against oneself.

Is it not sadly ironic, my colleagues, that criminals are protected from having to take the lie detector examination, but America's workers are not?

This bill is moderate. It does not ban polygraphs. It fully respects the previous decisions of this Congress to allow careful, limited, and specific use of lie detectors by the Federal Government in matters pertaining to our national security and public health.

Likewise, this bill provides cautious exemptions for those private businesses that directly impact on our national security or public health. We will be accepting amendments to provide other exemptions regarding dangerous drugs, security guards, and the protection of electric and nuclear powerplants and public transportation.

We will accept those amendments because they are a matter of protecting the national health and safety.

A bipartisan group of 168 Members of the House has joined me in cosponsoring this legislation. A companion bill to H.R. 1524 has been introduced in the Senate, S. 1815, by Chairman ORRIN HATCH and ranking member Senator EDWARD KENNEDY.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MCKINNEY].

Mr. MCKINNEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, quite some time ago a former colleague in this body left to become the mayor of the city of New York, and he handed me a bill, several of them in fact. One of them was a bill prohibiting the use of the polygraph in private employment screening and testing, and for private employees.

Since that time, the bill has led a many-checkered life in this body and is now in front of us, and I hope it passes.

We are talking about a basic point of civil rights when it comes to the polygraph. What amazes me is the fact that we are talking about it at a time when there is more and more doubt cast upon the very efficacy of this method of telling whether or not, in fact, someone is lying.

We have private employers throughout the country using the test in a way that it was never meant to be used, to find out the sexual proclivity, the marital status, the financial problems of individuals, for which they have no right to ask questions or to invade a human being's privacy.

In this day and age, this bill does not just simply become a matter of the lie detector and its ill use. It really becomes a matter of, sooner or later, we have to stop through electronic methods violating the civil rights and the privacy of the American citizens.

Almost every day that one picks up the newspaper, there is another way found to invade that human privacy; there is another requirement set up. And although I certainly am not going to argue the condition of drug tests or anything else, I am going to state that it has been proven that the lie detector is not an accurate test.

We have the U.S. Department of Justice, of all places, in 1976 testifying versus the reliability of polygraph tests and recommending not using polygraph evidence in criminal trials. The President's Privacy Protection Study Commission, established in 1974 under a Republican administration, concluded that the use of polygraphs is an unreasonable invasion of privacy that should be proscribed. The Congressional Office of Technology Assessment, in a 1983 study of the scientific validity of polygraph testing, concluded there is no scientific evidence to establish the validity of polygraph testing for screening a large number of people.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, what we are doing today is simply protecting the American people within the privacy of their lives from the interference of their employers. There is nothing within this bill that affects Federal employees. I wish it did. There is nothing in this bill that affects State employees. I wish it did. There is nothing in this bill that will exempt certain people from its protection if, in fact, they work for the defense industry or are contracted with by the Defense Department.

The bill is a basic, minimum statement of private and individual privacy and civil rights and deserves to pass. It was interesting, Mr. Chairman, and it may be interesting for the audience to realize that on a television show a "lie detector test" being given to someone who had never had one before, who was not asking for a single thing, who had nothing to hide, and the questions were innocuous, that by tightening certain muscles of the human body they could send the machine into paroxysms of misreadings.

This is the machine we are talking about, and to put people in fear of its application, in fear of their livelihood and job, in fear of their future relations with other people because of this test, is to me a total, complete and absolute violation of everything this country stands for.

I urge my colleagues to support the bill as passed out by the committee. It is the minimum standard we can get through to eliminate once and for all the private, unspecific, uncontrolled use of what I consider a machine that is itself, the big liar.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 1524, a measure which, in my opinion, is an important step to ensure that tens of thousands of workers are no longer wrongfully denied employment.

Over the last 10 years, the number of polygraph tests given in the workplace has tripled to the point that now more than 2 million tests are given each year. Approximately three-quarters of these tests are given for preemployment purposes, while the other one-quarter is used for the investigation of workers.

Unfortunately, the lie detector is an unreliable instrument. In fact, the courts refuse to admit the results of lie detector tests as evidence because of the documented inaccuracies of these gadgets. As Pat Williams pointed out, "It is sadly ironic that criminals are protected from polygraphs while American workers are not."

The bill doesn't totally ban the use of lie detectors, but it does stem the tide of their increasing use. The bill protects workers who are wrongfully denied employment by providing a heightened threshold of worker protection which States may exceed but may not fall below.

These inaccurate instruments simply shouldn't be allowed to regulate the workplace. The Office of Technology Assessment in 1983 indicated there was some evidence for polygraph validity in criminal investigations, but little evidence of validity in screening situations, whether they be preemployment, preclearance, periodic or aperiodic, random or dragnet. In fact, the agency said, error rates in preemployment polygraph screening could be as high as 50 percent.

This is a bill whose time has come—it deserves our support.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON].

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, as the ranking minority member on the Employment Opportunities Subcommittee which has jurisdiction over this legislation, I have had the opportunity to attend all of the hearings, to study the issue, and to try to arrive at some conclusions. I am here to suggest to you today that my conclusion is perhaps one of frustration with all of those options which have been presented before us.

I think if there is one tragedy in the whole labor management area of the 99th Congress, it is that we have resorted to the extremes, one extreme or the other, whether it be plant-closing legislation or whether it be polygraph legislation, or I suspect some other similar bills which may come down before this Congress in the future. We have apparently decided to abandon any efforts to achieve a reasonable consensus or reasonable middle ground.

I would like to suggest that there are three different concepts that ought to be considered when looking at this legislation, and those would be the issues of consistency, accuracy, and discrimination.

First and foremost is the issue of consistency. The legislation before us today, whether it be the bill from my friend and distinguished colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS], or whether it be the substitute that would be offered, I think both lack in the area of consistency. I have to tell you I have real problems. I have real problems going home to western Wisconsin and saying to the people in my home town of Osseo that the city clerk in that small community of 1,500 people and other city employees can all be required to take a lie detector test, but no one in the private business sector in town can use a similar means to deal with potential crime. I have real problems with consistency that says it is OK to use a polygraph, it is reliable enough to use a polygraph for national security, but it is not a reliable enough tool to use in the Ben Franklin Store. That seems to me to be very inconsistent, lacking some kind of consistent public policy.

The second question is one of accuracy, because, despite my concerns over consistency, I have similar problems with the accuracy of the polygraph as an instrument. It is clear in study after study that the polygraph is not a reliable tool.

Let me quote for you just a second from the committee report where it says:

For more than 20 years the Congress has been interested in the validity of these tests and every study done since 1983 for the U.S. Congress has found that there is no scientific basis for polygraphs as lie detectors.

The third issue that I bring to this Congress is the whole issue of discrimination, because I think we ought to be concerned about discrimination against potential employees. That is exactly what happens when you use the polygraph in the screening process when it is an unreliable tool. But I think also we must recognize when we are looking at discrimination that if our effort is one of eliminating discrimination in employee screening, that we then also ought to be in front of this Congress today and in the well of the House dealing with such issues as the usual interviews, as written tests and as references, because I would suggest to you that all of those three preemployment screening tools discriminate in other ways, sometimes just as much against a potential employee as does the polygraph.

Certainly, tools such as the polygraph have a need in this country. They are needed simply because when you look at the realities of business and industry in this country in the high risk industries, they need to have every possible opportunity to try to deal with the potentials for theft and fraud and abuse which occur.

Second, we must recognize that there is something like $10 billion a year in employee theft that occurs in the U.S. retailing industry alone. That is something that is a legitimate concern of America's private sector.

Third, in the area of drugs and controlled substances, there are approximately 10,000 drug-related thefts a year reported to the Drug Enforcement Agency; 15 percent of those come from employee theft.

On the other hand, I think we need to recognize that, while there may be a role and a need for the polygraph, there certainly are some major problems with the use of the polygraph. The validity of the polygraph is absolutely questioned I think by almost everyone. The little research which has been done on its accuracy is inconclusive, but that which is there would suggest that clearly it is not a reliable instrument.

We have problems with poorly trained examiners. We have major problems with irrelevant questions that are being asked. Further, outside factors such as stress, physical movement, the type of individual tested, length and depth of the test, and training and prejudices of the examiner, to name a few, can substantially affect the exam's results, particularly in preemployment screening.

Mr. Chairman, what then is the proper role of the Federal Government in providing a consistent policy which is fair to the business but at the same time protects current and prospective workers from inaccuracies and subsequent discrimination from faulty polygraph exams? I do feel that the Federal Government must do something to regulate and restrict the use of such questionable tools; however, I am concerned that an across-the-board ban of polygraph testing in the private sector workplace as provided for in H.R. 1524 would result in an unfair disadvantage for many private employers. On the other hand, the regulatory approach as proposed by Representatives YOUNG and DARDEN in H.R. 3916 would not provide sufficient protection.

For this reason, I prepared a substitute to H.R. 1524 that would uphold the provisions of the bill which prohibit polygraph testing for preemployment screening, and which would prohibit periodic testing of current employees for no identifiable cause. But, my substitute would allow private employers to use the polygraph as an investigative tool in the event of substantial employee theft, embezzlement, misappropriation of funds, or industrial espionage.

This substitute would also allow employers to make use of the polygraph for investigative purposes in the event that a crime has occurred which threatens public safety or results in substantial property damage. Retaining the language in H.R. 1524 that would allow for testing upon the theft or diversion of controlled substances, my alternative measure would also allow for preemployment screening for those employees who would have access to such controlled substances in their future employment. Finally, the amendment would exempt government agencies, public utilities facilities, and security services companies from the restrictions of the act—except for certain basic employee protection provisions that apply throughout.

There would, however, be restrictions placed upon polygraph testing as allowed by this substitute. No. 1, the use of the polygraph for investigative purposes would only be allowed if such testing is consistent with applicable State and local law and with any negotiated collective-bargaining agreement that explicitly or implicitly limits or prohibits the use of such lie detector exams. Second, polygraph tests would only be allowed to be administered to employees who have had access to stolen property or to facilities, items, individuals against which the crime occurred, or who are under reasonable suspicion. Last, the crime in question would have to be reported to an appropriate law enforcement agency before such polygraph testing would be allowed.

Other provisions of my substitute include certain protections for employees requested to take polygraph examinations as provided for under the act, such as restrictions on questions to be asked, a provision that examinees be provided copies of test results upon request, and that future employment decisions now be based solely on the results of the polygraph exam. Penalties under this substitute would be the same as those provided for under H.R. 1524 for violators of the act, although, the substitute if enacted would not preempt any State law which provides more restrictive protections on polygraph testing.

Unfortunately, in discussing this approach with my colleagues, I did not find that my substitute would meet with adequate support during today's consideration of the polygraph protection legislation to justify pursuit of its passage. Therefore, I have decided against offering it here today, although I continue to feel this alternative to be preferable.

Studies prove that the polygraph is much more accurate when used as an investigative tool as opposed to an employment screening mechanism. While this alternative would not have totally banned the use of the polygraph in the private sector—it would have restricted its use to that of an investigative tool—to be used only when cause is shown.

Many proponents of preemployment and less restrictive testing of current employees may have argued that this approach would be like "locking the barn door after the horse has already gotten out," but I disagree. While such testing would occur only after a theft or other crime had occurred—the fact that it would be an allowable tool—would have served to discourage employees from initially indulging in crimes.

In closing, let me just remind everyone that the majority of employees are very honest, upstanding individuals. I would still have concerns over the use of the polygraph even under the restricted circumstances provided for under my proposed substitute due to the test's questionable accuracy. However, this approach would have provided businesses with some form of protection against high losses due to employee crime—another tool that if used properly could have aided in prevention of such activities, while still restricting its use.

I continue to maintain that other forms of investigations and employee screening are much preferable to the use of the polygraph exam; this alternative would have just provided what I feel to be a more reasonable position for the Federal Government to take in protection against unfair polygraph examinations in the workplace than is found under H.R. 1524 or H.R. 3916.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. TRAFICANT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the time and the opportunity to speak out on this issue. I want to start out by commending the sponsor, the gentleman from Montana, Mr. PAT WILLIAMS, on his legislation and the intent and the content of that legislation. Mr. Chairman, I commend you also for bringing these issues to the floor and fighting so hard to maintain rights.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a conservative issue; this is not a liberal issue; This is not an employment issue, this is not a crime issue. This is a rights issue.

If an individual in America was accused of murder, of killing four people, and perhaps maybe even was seen with a gun smoking in his hands, he could hide behind his rights and refuse to take a polygraph, and either way that polygraph could not be used against him. Imagine the American people that have a 20-year-old daughter that is out to be hired for a job. She is not accused of committing any crime, but she has to go in and as one of the employment screening devices she is going to be subjected to a polygraph test.

My God, it is a wonder why we even need this type of legislation to protect rights when this administration is attempting to turn back the clock. I honest to God believe that this is not necessary to vote on. This is a common sense issue and a rights issue.

For all of those people out there that are saying we must protect America's national security, be advised the bill exempts all Government employers; Federal, State and local. Second of all, it exempts any private contractor doing business related to intelligence or counterintelligence with either the CIA, the National Security Agency, or the FBI.

In addition, this bill allows the use of lie detector tests by private contractors dealing with Defense Department counterintelligence functions.

Finally, the bill also allows employers to administer a polygraph to any employee with direct access to controlled substances when those substances have been reported stolen to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Let me say one other thing: The measure requires the Labor Department to prepare, print, and distribute notices to employers on the protections that this act provides.

This act, this bill, makes the rights of the average American in the workplace more secure. It does not turn back the clock. So when you hear all of this debate, the American people could recognize the fact that this is not conservative versus liberal; this is not Democrat versus Republican; this is not an employment process; this is not a crime process. This is a rights issue, and that is what separates us from the rest of the planet. Any other person in any other government; they do not enjoy those rights and we cannot let precedent turn back that clock.

So I am asking every Member here to support Mr. WILLIAMS' bill, to have an overwhelming vote for rights in this country; and, finally to oppose the, measure and the substitute being brought by Darden-Young.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, after serving more than 6 years as a prosecutor in Louisiana I have extensive experience using the polygraph exam. It proved to be a valuable investigative tool in my work as deputy chief of the criminal division in the U.S. attorney's office, as chief special prosecutor for the local district attorney's office, and as chief prosecutor for the organized crime unit of the Louisiana attorney general's office.

I voted with 332 of my colleagues in favor of legislation introduced by BILL YOUNG of Florida to expand the use of polygraph testing by Federal intelligence agencies so that they can better protect our national security. I believe that it would be a terrible mistake for the House to approve the use of the polygraph for the Government while prohibiting it for the private sector.

We've passed hundreds of bills requiring business to protect the health and welfare of their customers, and we hold them liable in court if they don't. But, if we pass H.R. 1524, what we are really doing is stripping many businesses of an important tool they need to protect the public.

For example, up to a million doses of legal drugs vanish from drug company inventories each year. These drugs have the potential to kill or cripple their users. By denying these companies the use of the polygraph, you kill a valuable tool they need to protect their inventories from thieves. Child care centers, nuclear facilities, and banks are just a few examples of the hundreds of other businesses that entrust their customers' health, welfare, and resources to their employees. These businesses need the polygraph to help them hire honest, competent people and to help find out when thefts and abuses occur.

When a certain retailer in my district stopped using his polygraph screening process, thefts went up so dramatically that he was forced to reinstitute it immediately. We all know that the cost of employee and customer theft in the retail business is ultimately passed on to the consumer, so a vote for this bill is a vote for higher retail prices.

The polygraph's accuracy has been shown in study after study to be between 85 to 95 percent. This is why we want our intelligence-gathering agencies to use it. In Louisiana, there were numerous instances in which we used the polygraph to help us in our criminal investigations.

In the space of 6 years during which I served in law enforcement, I can truthfully say that I never experienced any doubt in the usefulness of the polygraph. In fact, in several instances charges were actually dropped because of a defendant's performance on a polygraph. So the polygraph not only helps in catching crooks, but often it clears innocent people.

For all of this, just as polygraph results are inadmissible as evidence in court, I do not believe that employers should use the test results as the sole criterion in making a decision about an employee. This is also the opinion of most polygraph examiners and of the American Polygraph Association.

It is in everyone's interest that polygraph results be as accurate as possible. In a number of States, Louisiana among them, laws have been passed which establish guidelines for training and licensing of polygraph examiners, set requirements for the equipment used in the test, and institute protections for the rights of those taking the exam. This is why I am a cosponsor of H.R. 3916, introduced by Mr. YOUNG and Mr. DARDEN, which will be offered as a substitute to H.R. 1524.

Although I really fail to see any purpose in the Federal Government's involvement in this area at all, it would be better to pass legislation modeled on current State law requirements than to simply outlaw the use of the polygraph in the private sector. I believe that it is important that businesses continue to have the tools they need to protect the public's interests. The polygraph is one of these tools, and I urge the House to reject H.R. 1524.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume to bring to the attention of the body that the administration is opposed to the substitute and to the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS].

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 1524—the Employee Protection Act of 1985. This bill will eliminate the widespread and growing use of so-called lie detector tests as a condition of employment in America. It will not block their use by law enforcement agencies for actual investigations. Rather, it is aimed at stopping the growing abuse of polygraph use when private employers force their employees to take such tests as a condition of employment even though they are not even suspected of any wrongdoing. This practice is un-American—it assumes everyone to be guilty until they prove their innocence.

My views on polygraphs have been developed over many years, as a member of the House Government Operations Committee. This committee has overseen the Government's polygraph programs since the early 1960's, and has strongly recommended against the use of polygraphs for screening in the Federal Government in four reports.

Last year, the Office of Technology Assessment surveyed the scientific literature on polygraph validity for the Government Operations Committee. In its report, the OTA concluded that there was no scientifically acceptable study to support the use of polygraphs for screening purposes, and that any validity that the polygraph test may have for specific incident use would likely decrease dramatically in a screening context.

OTA found that coercing persons to take a polygraph test would affect validity negatively. By its nature, screening as a condition of employment is extremely coercive.

Since OTA's study, many proponents of polygraph use have backed away from their claims of high polygraph validity. Instead, they argue the concept of utility. They point to numerous instances when the polygraph exam or the threat of the exam, has been useful in eliciting important information or even confessions.

We should not confuse validity with utility. There is no question that the polygraph can be a very intimidating tool and may have some utility in that regard, just as the dunking stool, the rack, and the firing squad have had in past centuries. As former President Nixon says about polygraphs, "I don't know how accurate they are, but I do know that they'll scare the hell out of people."

This elaborate con operation should not be allowed to be institutionalized as a feature of our Nation's workplace. It is inherently offensive to American concepts of justice.

Last month, the world's largest association of psychologists condemned the widespread use of polygraph tests for screening purposes. The American Psychological Association concluded that conducting such tests by psychologists would be unethical. The group found the scientific evidence regarding the validity of polygraphing to be "unsatisfactory and particularly poor concerning polygraph use in employment screening." They recognized the "great damage to the innocent persons who must inevitably be labeled as deceptors" in such screening situations.

We should not allow passing some bogus lie detector test to become a condition of employment in this country. I urge you to vote for H.R. 1524.

I want to take this time to commend the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS] and his committee for their outstanding work in bringing this legislation to the floor, backed up as they were by substantial support from the Republicans and from a bipartisan staff that is truly outstanding.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP].

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I thank my colleague from Vermont and commend him and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS] for their work in bringing this bill, which I consider to be an important piece of legislation, to the floor. There is no doubt that there are many honest and well-meaning employers who see this as a necessary mechanism by which to screen applicants for jobs, and investigate cases of wrongdoing. I do not deny that. I think there are well-meaning men and women on both sides of this issue, but there is a civil rights consideration that has to be made in this debate and it is one that I feel compelled to make.

We need to protect people from polygraphs for obvious reasons. There are serious flaws with regard to their administration, there are problems with the ability to detect veracity, and of the training and competency of the polygraph examiner.

We protect criminals from polygraphs. But yet some working men and women would be subject to something that is not allowable in a court of law. The crime? They want a job. They could be intimidated, they could get nervous, they could be very subjective with regard to how they respond. They could be put under pressure about what their decisions would be on some matters that have nothing to do with the issue of honesty or crime or drugs, which are legitimate concerns of employers, small business men and women around the country.

I think there has to be protection. I have looked at this issue. I have wrestled with the arguments made by my friends, some of whom are for and some of whom are against, and I must say that all of us want to do the right thing. But I think it is important for the Members of this body to recognize that there are very important issues at stake. One is the civil liberties of the American people and the working men and women of this country.

The participation that they have in a lie detector test seems to me to be too much to ask them as a condition for employment.

Now the bill does recognize the limited need for the use of polygraphs for some investigatory purposes under controlled and reputable circumstances; it provides for an exemption from that ban for Federal, State, and local government, for businesses engaged in Government contracts that relate to national security. But for the vast majority of employers, in my view, passage of this legislation will help protect the rights, the legitimate rights of the workers and those people who are seeking work.

I would urge a vote for this legislation. It is not, nor is any legislation, perfect, but as far as I am concerned, it is an important step in the right direction for both sides of the aisle to join together in this way in order to protect those very serious concerns that we have about how this can be distorted, how it could be abused, and how workers' rights would be denied them under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP] has expired.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 additional seconds to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time and appreciate it, so that I may finish my point.

It is very clear that polygraphs obtain no more accurate results than if the administrator in some cases just flipped a coin. Now we have to ask ourselves: Is this what we want to develop in our country? Would the conditions for employment require that type of flippancy, if you will, that type of denigration in some cases of the rights of an individual, man or woman, who is seeking employment or legitimately wants to carry out their rights under the free-enterprise system?

Mr. Chairman, I urge a vote for the Williams-Jeffords legislation and applaud their efforts and look forward to participating in the rest of the debate.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1524, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act of 1985. This legislation is desperately needed to protect workers from the indiscriminate use of polygraph testing which is neither valid nor reliable.

Polygraph testing is used in employment screening and "dragnet" searches for the dishonest on the theory that the polygraph is a "lie detector." In point of fact, the polygraph is simply one more stress detector which shares the same problems of reliability and validity as its early forebears. Earlier versions of the polygraph include medieval tests of guilt and innocence such as the requirement that clergymen who were charged with a crime swallow a large piece of bread without water. This mild version of the trial by ordeal was based on the simple observation that when people are frightened—under stress—the mouth would go dry preventing the swallowing of dry bread. Today, by using other measures of stress such as heart rate, breathing, and perspiration, the "trial by ordeal" takes on a scientific gloss without ever having been able to pass scientific muster. In point of fact, when polygraph results have been studied they have been found wanting as was pointed out in the 1985 Office of Technical Assessment study on polygraphs.

Given the lack of validity and reliability, why then are polygraphs so appealing to employers? It would appear, in the fact of security problems, that employers would rather trust a machine rather than their own judgment. Today, more than 30 percent of the Fortune 500 companies and half of the retail businesses use polygraphs instead of, or in addition to, reference checks. The results of polygraph use have not justified its use. Employers who do not use polygraphs have lower rates of theft than those that do. This result would indicate that preemployment reference checks and sound inventory practices may be far more effective in the control of theft.

Polygraphs are also used to gain information which is not related to employment. Frequently questions are asked about political and social beliefs as well as sexual attitudes and practices. Women have been subjected to particularly repugnant questions of a sexual nature. Although redress may be available through legal action for such abuse, that is small comfort to the women who have been put in the humiliating position of having been asked these questions in the first place.

The polygraph's general lack of validity and reliability is enhanced when one is testing a particularly sensitive or intelligent individual. As noted in the OTA report:

> Because exceptionally honest and intelligent individuals may be highly reactive to questions about their truthfulness, such desirable employees will be misidentified at higher rates than other less desirable employees.

In short, the polygraph will label as liars those who are most truthful.

The polygraph appears to be an easy way out for the employer who is faced with a security problem. All of those graphs and wires seem to indicate that something scientific is going on. In reality, the polygraph is merely an updated trial by ordeal with all of the faults of the earlier versions. There is simply no short cut to determining the truth. Employers are faced, as they have always been, with the tedious task of checking references and making judgments. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 1524 without weakening amendments.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, are we going to be consistent this afternoon, or are we going to create a double standard? Are we going to allow individual businesses to use an investigative tool which we require of the Department of Defense, or are we going to tell those businesses that this tool is off limits for them?

On June 26, 333 of us supported an amendment to the Department of Defense authorization bill where we directed the Pentagon to use random polygraph examinations to screen Pentagon and contractor employees with access to classified information.

In June we voted in favor of requiring this polygraph testing and 9 months later we are considering a vote against it!

What short memories we have!

How can we be so inconsistent?

The issue before us today is simple: Either the polygraph is a valid tool or it is not.

According to the committee report—and I quote—"the committee recognizes that certain employers should be exempted from the provisions of this bill." The bill exempts those involved in matters of national security and those who have direct access to controlled substances.

Now the question we need to ask ourselves this afternoon is this:

"If the polygraph is an evil, unreliable tool, as the advocates of this bill would have us believe, then why should anyone be exempted from H.R. 1524 and be required to take a polygraph?"

The answer, of course, is that it is a positive tool. We recognized its merits with our overwhelming vote in June and the committee tacitly admits them by providing for exemptions.

FBI statistics indicate that internal theft is on the rise. Financial institutions in the United States lost over $280 million in 1983 and over $380 million in 1984. This is over nine times the amount lost by robberies.

Your constituents and mine share the burden of internal fraud and embezzlement. Estimates place the increase in consumer prices resulting from internal theft as high as 15 percent.

How can we justify passing this kind of price increase on to the consumers in our districts when there is an investigative tool available which can help avoid it? Clearly it would be bad public policy to eliminate an important instrument in the fight against these losses when the problem is increasingly serious.

This bill places businesses in a catch-22 situation. Employers are held liable for the conduct of their employees and oftentimes required to pay astronomical judgments as a result of litigation. Nevertheless H.R. 1524 denies them the use of a tool which will help to ensure proper conduct.

The issue is best addressed by State regulation—not Federal prohibition. A majority of the States and the District of Columbia now regulate the use of polygraphs in the workplace, helping to assure their responsible use. Licensing procedures and guidelines are appropriate State functions, similar to licensing doctors, real estate brokers, and lawyers. There is no need for the Federal Government to intervene where the States are already responsive.

Polygraph testing has limitations and should not be the sole criterion for determining guilt or innocence. Yet most law enforcement methods, from fingerprinting to voice identification, are also open to interpretation. The extent and seriousness of the situation demands that polygraph, one effective crime prevention and detection tool, be available to employers.

Recent incidents of child abuse at day care centers only highlight the need for the use of polygraph testing to protect children. I would be very uncomfortable leaving my child at a day care center which was legally prevented from using the polygraph to screen out abusive individuals.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation is fundamentally flawed.

It is inconsistent with prior action by the Members of this House;

It is inconsistent with the tacit admissions of the committee;

It closes its eye to the staggering problem of internal theft;

It needlessly passes costs on to the consumer;

It places employers in a no-win situation; and

It needlessly interferes with State regulations.

Mr. Chairman, this is a bad old bill and I urge my colleagues to vote against it.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1524, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act. The bill provides the American worker with important protection against an invidious evil—the polygraph test.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose the widespread use of polygraphs for a simple reason, they don't work. Polygraphs only measure physiological response. It makes no claim to, and does not, measure deception. Study after study has concluded that the polygraph simply is not accurate. When used for preemployment screening, polygraphs are particularly notorious.

Polygraph advocates say that the polygraph has great utility, that it is a useful tool to root out the truth. But Mr. Chairman, the bottom line is that polygraphs cannot ascertain truth, but serve only to coerce employees.

This bill makes certain exceptions for matters relating to drugs and national security. These appear to be limited and reasonable exceptions, based on testimony developed at committee hearings.

Some of our colleagues, Mr. Chairman, favor alternatives to this bill, where polygraphs are limited to certain situations or are licensed for use. The unreliability of the polygraph makes these alternatives unacceptable. Polygraphs just don't work, and should not be used as a device to deny employment opportunities.

Mr. Chairman, I urge our colleagues to support this bill as a necessary measure to rid our Nation of this modern day witchcraft.

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Chairman, today we are considering legislation which will prevent the use of polygraphs by employers in the private sector. This is a very controversial issue, and it does deserve the attention of this body. But our goal should be insuring that the polygraph is not used indiscriminately by untrained examiners for unwarranted purposes. Under the guise of protecting the rights of individuals, the supporters of this legislation have decided to overlook the rights of corporations to hire the most qualified and dependable persons, and the rights of the general public who must ultimately pick up the costs of employee crime and negligence.

Crime in the workplace is not some fictitious problem that is used as a justification by an employer who wants to violate an individual's constitutional rights. It is a real problem with real consequences for all of us. According to a recent study done of the banking industry, over 80 percent of all losses incurred by banks around the country are a result of employee theft. According to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, these losses amounted to $282 million in 1983, and $382 million in 1984. Besides these losses, we have heard stories over the past several months of many officers of financial institutions pleading guilty to involvement in "money laundering" schemes often associated with organized crime and drug trafficking.

Employee theft in the retail industry accounts for millions of dollars worth of losses every year. According to groups such as the American Retail Federation, these thefts account for about 15 percent of the cost of all items sold today. These are costs that are borne directly by the consumer.

The use of illegal drugs has become a major problem in the workplace. Time magazine has made this issue its cover story for this week because of its implications. Drugs play a major role in both white and blue-collar crime. In addition, it has lead to loss of lives and property, especially in the transportation industry. I'm sure every one of us have heard the stories of truck drivers who have been involved in accidents while on drugs. Recent fatal railroad accidents in the United States and Canada have been attributed to human error as a result of drugs. Businesses have a right to protect themselves from those people who will not abide by company policy, thus subjecting that company to increased costs and the general public to increased risks.

This legislation would prevent multinational companies such as airlines from conducting preemployment polygraphs. Given the problems we now face with increased espionage cases and terrorism, it seems ridiculous that we would enact legislation which would prevent these companies from taking the necessary steps to protect American interests.

This body was so concerned with the espionage issue that just a few weeks ago we passed legislation which would increase the use of polygraphs by the Department of Defense and defense-related industries. This legislation passed by almost a 5-to-1 margin in the House. At that time, there was no argument about the veracity of the process or the need for it. Polygraphs were an acceptable way to guarantee our national security. What has changed in the past few weeks that makes us differentiate between certain industries and certain sectors of the economy? We are quick to point out the risks and take necessary precautions when our national interests are at stake. Isn't protection from crime a national interest?

I received a call from Bruce Balcom of the McKesson Drug Co. In Wilsonville, OR, yesterday. He expressed his concern about what the loss of polygraph requirements would do in his industry. I'm sure everyone is aware of the many precautions taken by these companies to protect their products from theft. Mr. Balcom told me how easy it would be to steal pills that have a market value of $17 and sell them on the street for about $800 apiece. It is imperative for companies involved in the pharmaceutical industry, such as McKesson and Eli Lily, to have the opportunity to protect themselves and the community from those who seek employment for the purpose of engaging in illegal drug trade. The use of preemployment polygraphs is vital to this effort.

What we are saying if we pass H.R. 1524 is that company officials do not have the same rights as their employees. An individual has a right to protect himself from an invasion of his privacy, but the company does not have the right to know whether or not the person applying for the job could cause potential harm to the business or the community.

Polygraphs are a useful and necessary tool in the business community. No one is claiming that they are 100 percent accurate, but by the same token, they are no less reliable than individual interviews. Polygraphs cannot, and should not, be the sole justification for the hiring or firing of an employees. But a professionally administered polygraph exam will insure that everyone's rights are protected—employee, employer, and the general public.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1524, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act. This bill broadly prohibits employers from requiring employees and job applicants to take any polygraph test. The bill also prohibits employers from discharging or disciplining any employee who refuses to take such a test. All government employers—Federal, State, and local—are exempt from these prohibitions. There are also certain exemptions from the bill involving persons in highly security-sensitive employment.

Mr. Chairman, the polygraph machine is not as some would suggest a "lie detector." Rather, it is a mechanical device which, when connected to an individual, measures a number of physiological phenomena which are subject to widely varying interpretations. Most polygraph machines measure heart beat, blood pressure, respiration, and other functions. From this data, an examiner draws inferences. The scientific literature is extensive on the polygraph. Many studies, including an authoritative study by Prof. David Lykken of the University of Minnesota, titled, "A Tremor in the Blood," clearly establish that the polygraph machine is not a reliable device for always discerning who is telling the truth from who is not. Polygraph results are subject to widely varying interpretations based on the experience of the person administering the test in interpreting its results but also on the physical condition of the subject at the time the test is administered.

The consequences of a mistake in interpreting a polygraph test with a result which is adverse to an employee or job applicant can be devastating to that individual's future employment prospects. Because of this fact, many States have moved to limit these types of tests.

Unfortunately, however, employers in some States which have moved to restrict the use of such tests have occasionally required employees or job applicants to take such tests in another State with less restrictive laws on the subject. This bill would end such practices through a broad prohibition.

Mr. Chairman, there are certainly more reasonable and reliable methods for assessing the character of employees and job applicants than through the administration of polygraph tests. Thorough background checks of employees and job applicants and extensive interviews with references and known acquaintances as well as a careful evaluation of an individual's prior work history provide a far more detailed and reliable base of information about an individual than the results of a polygraph test. Employers have a right to expect that their employees will perform their work honestly and competently. There are many ways to insure that these expectations will be met which are far less intrusive. But while employers have certain legitimate expectations, so too, do employees and job applicants. They have a right to an honest and fair assessment of their qualifications for employment based on information which is verifiable, accurate, and credible. Polygraph tests do not meet this threshold test of fairness. Surely that is why the results of polygraph tests are not admissible in evidence in any court of law in the United States.

While I do not favor most of the exceptions to this measure which permit some employers, such as Federal, State, and local governments to use polygraph tests, I believe that the enactment of this legislation is an improvement over the indiscriminate use of polygraph tests that may exist in many States today.

I am pleased to support H.R. 1524.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 15. This Act shall take effect one year after the date of enactment.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD, inasmuch as it has been previously printed in the RECORD and copies have been made available to the interested parties.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. YOUNG of Florida was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I thank the chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to my colleagues I have been here on the floor and have heard the debate from the very beginning this afternoon. I would like to compliment all those who participated in the debate and presented what I think is a reasonable and logical debate.

I offer this amendment in the nature of a substitute for myself, as the author of the amendment last June which provided polygraph services for our national security efforts, and for my friend and colleague from Georgia, Mr. DARDEN, who is a distinguished Member of the House of Representatives and who also served, in a former life, as a prosecuting attorney with great exposure to the use of polygraph.

Mr. Chairman, the substitute does not prohibit the use of polygraphs. H.R. 1524, however, originally set out to prohibit the use of polygraphs. But in committee they adopted several amendments that exempted certain types of industry as well as government. It is my understanding on the floor later today they have agreed to accept additional amendments that would provide additional exemptions to the prohibition that H.R. 1524 would bring to the use of polygraphs.

Mr. DARDEN and I suggest a different approach. We agree, for example, with those speakers who have made the point that this is really a rights issue—the right of the employee. We agree with that. We would say to you, Mr. Chairman, that our substitute is the only legislation before the House that actually provides a "bill of rights" for those people who might be examined during the seeking of employment. We actually provide in the law a bill of rights for those employees and prospective employees who would be subject to the polygraph.

Mr. Chairman, it has also been suggested that this is a way to get at the guilty, that we are looking to prove someone guilty before they have been given a chance to prove they are innocent.

In some cases that may be the case. For example we know from the Walker spy case, that instigated the amendment last June on the national defense bill, that the authority to use the polygraph was asked for consistently by those in naval intelligence who told us it would be one of the best tools they could use to deter espionage against our Nation. So we know, it is a good tool. By itself it is not a total tool, it is only part of an overall effort.

There is more to our substitute.

Our approach also protects the innocent. Yes, we are looking for the guilty, but we are also seeking to protect the innocent and ours is the only approach on the floor today that actually will bring protection for the innocent.

I would like to give you an example: Back in Florida I have a good friend who owns a number of drug stores. He began to find narcotics and controlled substances missing from his warehouses and his shelves and he could not determine who was stealing the substances. So he considered firing everyone in his business who had access to those drugs and those controlled substances.

Now that really would not have been fair because it was subsequently proved that all of the employees were not involved in the theft—just one. So instead of firing all of the innocent people, he decided to employ a polygraph examiner. Through the use of a polygraph examination, and through the extended investigation based on the results of the polygraph examination, he determined who the guility party was.

The guilty party admitted it, and the guilty party was terminated. He lost his job, but innocent people were allowed to keep their jobs.

We think that the innocent should be protected, and we believe that we can protect them under the substitute that Mr. DARDEN and I offer today.

The reason we believe our approach protects the innocent and does the job that is required in private industry is that our substitute provides for minimum professional standards for polygraph examiners. One of the speakers earlier today said that many people in our country believe that any time there is a polygraph examination, it is given by the CIA or it is given by the FBI or it is given by a police agency. They made the point that that is not true, because many polygraph examinations are given by people who are not nearly as professional as those who give them for the Department of Defense. We agree with that. That is the basis of our approach.

We are asking for a Federal law that would establish certain stiff professional requirements before a person would be permitted to give polygraph examinations and, at the same time, we provide a bill of rights I mentioned earlier for those who might be required to take that polygraph examination.

We do not want to do what Mr. JACK BROOKS mentioned earlier, that is to go back to the days of the dunking tool. We do not want to use the dunking tool any more than the gentleman from Texas does. That is why we are trying to make sure that those people who give polygraph examinations are not the dunking tool professionals. We seek to ensure that they are able to do the job in a professional manner, that they have had the proper education, and that they have had the proper training.

Mr. Chairman, in addition, this is a States' right issue. It was mentioned earlier in debate, that some 31 States have already enacted polygraph legislation. We would like to encourage the States to take the lead—and if any State would like to go further than we go in the Federal law, in the proposal that Mr. DARDEN and I make, they are permitted to do so. In fact, if a State decided to ban polygraph altogether, they could do so under the substitute that we offer today.

It has been suggested that the polygraph is not a reliable tool. I would say that if we are going to rely only on the polygraph, only on that tool, that I would have to agree. But it is only part of an overall investigative capability.

For example, in the Walker spy case that I mentioned, one of the Walker family denied any implication whatsoever in that spy case where they were giving classified information to the Soviets. But after he was confronted with the results of a polygraph examination that indicated there was some problem in his responses to the questions, he finally confessed. He confessed that he had been lying; that he was involved in divulging national security secrets to the Soviets; and that he went on to give us additional information that was used in the case against the Walkers. We suggest that the people of the United States deserve that kind of protection, not only for national security issues, but also for private business.

As the sponsor of the bill, H.R. 1524, has suggested, he is going to exempt from his legislation some industries. So, in effect, what the gentleman is saying is that polygraph is OK here in one area but not another. Well, my suggestion is if it is OK here, it should also be OK over here, if it is done in a professional fashion.

The cost to the American consumer from internal theft is estimated to be $40 billion each and every year. That means in the case of most retailers, that about 10 to 15 percent of the cost of their clothes that they sell, the shoes that they sell, the food that they sell, the furniture, the household items, whatever they sell, whatever your constituents go out to buy at a store at any given time, 10 to 15 percent of that cost is due to internal theft.

Mr. Chairman, I think that is a terrible tax. If we came here to the floor today asking to add a 10-percent or a 15-percent sales tax on all of those goods, I think there would be a revolution in the House. I do not believe we would ever pass that kind of a bill. But because of internal theft, the prices are increased from 10 to 15 percent.

We have to stop that, and it can be stopped. We have proof positive that when the polygraph system is used, that the cost of employee theft goes down from 15 percent to about 1 percent of the price of goods. We have a communication from the manager of Days Inn, a motel chain. Before Days Inn used the polygraph, they had losses of over $1 million a year. When they went to the use of a polygraph, those losses dropped to just over $100,000 a year, a reduction of some 85 percent. That means that the cost of that theft was reduced and did not have to be passed on to consumers.

I have a letter, a case file of a television repair man who was interviewed for his job and denied ever being convicted of a crime. He denied any former problems of that type. He went out on a call from his employer and he sexually molested two small children. The records are full of this type of thing. They are also full of cases where innocent people have been protected by the polygraph. But in this case, the repairman had in previous employment been convicted of sexual molestation a number of times. Had he been polygraphed, that might have been found.

I do not use this as some kind of a scare tactic. I am just trying to give examples of the fact, that yes, the polygraph does work. We can provide many additional examples of how the innocence of people has been protected by the polygraph.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the substitute.

Mr. Chairman, according to the testimony from representatives of private industry before my subcommittee, it was testified it would not be a part of an investigation, but it would be the only tool used to determine guilt. Therein lie the fallacy of the arguments by the gentleman in favor of the substitute.

The situation is this. I do believe that there should be standards in which we determine who is qualified to become polygraph examiners. But I believe those standards should be national and not just left up to the options of the individual States, where we already know what practices are that where polygraphs are not allowed, employers will transport citizens to areas where they are allowed, give the polygraph test, and then bring them back.

So I would assume that if it was allowed the way the substitute described that States that had lesser qualifications for polygraph examiners, where the polygraph regulations were looser, the employers would do the same thing and move the employees to those areas.

Let me tell you another couple of reasons why I and the committee oppose the substitute. The Congressional Budget Office reports that the substitute will cost the Government $2 million. Do we really want to spend $2 million to put the congressional good housekeeping seal of approval on this gadget?

The Congressional Research Service reports that the substitute would create a patchwork quilt of regulations with the possibility of adjacent States having Federal, State, city, or county regulations.

The substitute claims that the prospective or current employees can volunteer to take the lie detector test. How is it voluntary when employers require the test as a condition of employment? Whenever State legislatures have blessed the lie detector by passing regulatory legislation, the use of this gadget has skyrocketed.

Mr. Chairman, I stand in opposition to this, and I want to alert the Members that when we vote on this bill, we are voting on the substitute on the next vote, not the Williams bill.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today along with the gentleman from Florida to introduce and support the substitute which offers protection for consumers and employees through rigorous, but fair, regulation of polygraph use in the private sector.

Mr. Chairman, I want to take a moment, however, to commend the chairman, and also the sponsor, the gentleman from Montana, for bringing their critical issue to the floor of the House. I certainly agree with them that we might have a different approach to solve the problem, but I think it is one of national urgency. I want to commend them for taking the lead and bringing it forward. While we disagree on the methods that would be used, I appreciate their courage in coming forward with this very important legislation.

But as I said before, I disagree with the methods being used in H.R. 1524. What H.R. 1524 does is basically ban the use of the polygraph in the private sector.

Oh, sure, let us have a few exceptions, a few exemptions. Let us let the nuclear power industry out. Let us let out people who are involved with national security.

□ 1650

Let us leave out all Government workers; let us exclude the entire transportation industry; let us only put this burden on the businessmen of the United States.

I am saying to the Members now that we have all heard this phrase in Washington recently, which goes something like this: I am for tax reform but. Now everybody is saying: I do not think we ought to use the polygraph but.

Everybody wants their specific little exception or exemption.

So what I am saying to the Members today is that if polygraphs are a sham and a farce and a device which cannot be depended upon, why not use this vehicle, this legislation here today, to ban their use entirely from use in America today?

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Government Operations was up a few moments ago saying, in very touching terms, his feelings for the protection of the rights of people who are being protected by this act.

Why not extend the same protection to Government employees? If the polygraph does not work in the private sector, it sure does not work in the public sector.

Let me, basically, go through what this substitute does. As a former district attorney, incidentally, I have come to rely on the polygraph as a very reliable investigative tool. As a defense counsel, I used it not to indicate guilt but, in many instances, to exonerate persons who where wrongfully charged with a crime.

I would point out to the Members, when it is said that the polygraph is subject to some degree of failure, that it is not perfect; I submit that it is not perfect. However, our criminal justice system is not perfect. The House of Representatives in which we stand today is not perfect. I also tell you there are more people in the prisons of America wrongfully convicted on mistaken eye witness testimony, than for any other purpose.

So, sure, polygraphs are not perfect; but they are a reliable tool.

We do two things in this substitute. One is that we impose minimum standards on the examiner to be sure that he can properly be trained to do his job. The requirements are listed in the substitute.

The second thing we do, which I think is very important, is that we prohibit the employer from using the polygraph as the sole purpose for which a person can be denied employment or fired. You have got to have other evidence. And, also, it has a bill of rights in here which prevents any individual from being asked about matters of a personal nature, sexual matters, matters having to do with that person's union affiliation or political beliefs.

So this substitute here today I think very wisely provides a bill of rights and protection to the worker, probably far more protection than is provided by H.R. 1524.

I want to say, in conclusion, that 333 of you voted last June 1985 to sanction the use of the polygraph in national security and in the Department of Defense.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. DONNELLY). The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DARDEN] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DARDEN was allowed to proceed for 15 additional seconds.)

Mr. DARDEN. Surely, we owe the private sector the same degree and the same amount of protection that we owe the Department of Defense.

So let me say, in conclusion, vote for the substitute and against the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the substitute.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the substitute that is offered by the gentleman from Florida and by the gentleman from Georgia. I rise to support the substitute and to oppose the bill.

It seems to me that there are some essential differences between the bill that is before us and the substitute that is offered. It seems to me that the essential difference is that the bill would prohibit the use of the polygraph in virtually all circumstances in the private sector, and the bill that the two gentleman have constructed and are proposing as a substitute would permit the polygraph to be used to protect employees' rights and permit the polygraph to be used as one tool, not the sole tool—it would prohibit that. It would permit it to be used as one tool but not the sole tool.

I think what the gentleman from Florida has done with his substitute is to acknowledge the need from time to time that the polygraph be used to protect the employees, it is to create minimum standards that States then can and sometimes do adopt and say that the polygraph cannot be used as the sole test but can be used as one test.

I would like to yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG] to clarify some of the things that are in this very well-crafted piece of legislation that does precisely what needs to be done to protect employee rights.

As I understand, and I would ask the gentleman, under his legislation, the substitute polygraph bill, the polygraph examiners must meet specific requirements. Could the gentleman elaborate on some of those requirements?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. If the gentleman will yield, I appreciate the gentleman's comments. He is exactly right. In this substitute there are two pages of protections for the rights of the examinee—the person who might be examined.

For example, the examinee would have to sign a notification prior to any polygraph examination, and that notification would state that he is doing it on a voluntary basis. He is not required to take that test.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is saying that he has to sign a written notice prior to the examination?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. That is correct. And that notice includes the fact that he is doing it voluntarily.

Now, during that test, the examiner may not inquire into an examinee's religious belief or affiliations, he may not inquire into beliefs or opinions regarding racial matters, he may not inquire into political beliefs or affiliations, he may not inquire into sexual preferences or activities unless—and this is a very important exception—unless it is necessary to determine the qualifications of the employee to be employed by a nursing home, where so many of our elderly Americans spend the rest of their lives, a rest home, a sanitarium, a hospital, or a day-care nursery.

So in those cases where we have a right and an obligation to protect senior citizens or children in those institutions, those type of questions would be permitted.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would ask the gentleman, further, as I understand the intent of the gentleman's substitute is to say that the polygraph, then, could not be used as a sole criteria but merely as one additional tool.

So does the gentleman have a prohibition that no one could lose their job based solely on a polygraph test?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. The gentleman makes a very valid observation, and I thank him for that. That is correct. Our law provides that the polygraph will not be the sole determining factor. It further provides that the examinee may at any time terminate the polygraph examination, after the first sentence, after the first question, halfway through the examination, or wherever. He may terminate it and still he could not lose his job or be denied employment strictly because of that.

Mr. BARTLETT. And I would ask the question that, as I understand it, the person being examined could obtain a written copy of all the questions and his responses, merely for asking?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Exactly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Are there penalties provided in the gentleman's substitute if an examiner violates the legislation?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Yes. We provide in this substitute that the examinee who feels his rights have been violated may file an action in Federal court, and the fine would be up to $10,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for his clarification.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to be that what we have is a choice between a sledge hammer approach and an approach of the gentleman from Florida in the substitute that would provide very precise and real protections. So rather than to allow this House to simply vote on the title, I think that what the gentleman is proposing is a way to provide those protections without that sledge hammer of eliminating all use of what is used in an area of employee rights.

And the gentleman from Florida said something during his opening which I think is correct, and that is that this is an employee rights piece of legislation. The gentleman's substitute does provide for the rights of employees.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BARTLETT was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BARTLETT. The employees who would be protected by the substitute and would be harmed by the bill are those employees who are in high risk, ex-felons, young people, persons who have lost a previous job, and the polygraph used as one tool can help him to get that job. It protects those fellow employees who are falsely accused. It protects employees during taking the test and it protects the consumers who should not have to pay the higher prices due to theft and pilferage.

I think the gentleman approaches the subject correctly and with an idea of employee rights.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the substitute.

Mr. Chairman, I approach the subject, of course, in favor of the original bill and against the substitute, the whole subject, with trepidation. A number of years ago, I had the opportunity to serve as the Lafayette County prosecuting attorney back home in Missouri, and on several occasions, I was aware of and knew of the administration of polygraph tests to people who were suspected of criminal activity in one form or another. As a result of the experience that I had, in some cases, at best, there was inconclusiveness. On two occasions, I have good reason to believe that people "beat" the test, that these are far from reliable operative tests and that they are no better than the person who gives them. We are fortunate back home in my county right now to have a sheriff who has been either a deputy or a sheriff for some 27 years, and I think no one would question his ability. But compare this gentleman, Sheriff Gene Darnell, in my home county, with someone who has had 6 weeks of training and is a certified polygraph tester and I think that there would be a great deal of difference between the two.

I need not go on at length about this, but I would like to question one bit of this, that there is language that would tend to cause us to believe that the polygraph test under the substitute would not be the sole tool, but I can hear people, unfortunately, saying, "But, you know, they flunked the lie detector test."

In all truthfulness, I have some serious problems or qualms about the issue and, because of my past experience, I am driven irresistibly in favor of the bill.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKELTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to join my colleague in opposing the substitute and supporting the bill.

The polygraph is not a science, and this amendment tries to put the Good Housekeeping stamp of approval on the use of polygraphs in this country—and you cannot do it.

The basic problem is that the polygraph is not reliable. It tests your heart rate, your breathing rate and your sweat, or your galvanic skin response, and all of those can be modified or subjected to change by reason of people who are hyperreactors, who are very, very nervous or who are on medicine, such as beta blockers, which prevent those things from happening the way the polygraph operator would want them to be.

The polygraph is very intimidating and it can take a person, an honest person, and turn that person into a wild, scared person, for fear of the machine that is strapped around them, and it is unfair to use that as a tool to deprive that person of a job.

I think the gentleman also makes a good point concerning the contention that under the substitute the polygraph could not be a sole criteria, only one of the criteria. That is ridiculous, because if an examiner says that the gentleman or the gentlewoman flunked the test, I guarantee that person is not going to get the job.

So I join my colleague in urging defeat of the substitute and in support of the bill.

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKELTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I also agree with his remarks. The gentleman points out very well that we will never know if it is the sole reason for the decision in firing somebody. In fact, if we looked at the substitute, it is wide open to all kinds of misinterpretations, using the word "substantial" without defining exactly what "substantial" would mean, when they talk about simply having to have the key provisions of H.R. 3916 employed by written statement by the Secretary of Labor of their State. It could be one sentence saying that they would do that without any of the facts involved as to how they will enforce it.

But let me go more to the direct issue. What the bill is designed to do is to say that someone cannot lose their job or you cannot refuse to hire someone because they will not take a polygraph test. You cannot deny someone a livelihood because they will not take a polygraph test. And I do not see the people who are supporting this substitute saying that candidates for public office, including the U.S Congress, should have to take a polygraph test or that incumbents of Congress should have to take a polygraph test. I do not see them proposing that the Ethics Committee of this Congress and this House should use a polygraph test. Why?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON] has expired.

(On request of Mr. HERTEL of Michigan and by unanimous consent, Mr. SKELTON was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

□ 1705

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Why in the substitute do they not require polygraph tests for elected officials or candidates for public office? Simply because they are unreliable, they are not recognized in court, and therefore we should not take innocent individuals and take away their livelihood or deny them the right to have a job and apply for a job because they will not be intimidated by being forced to take such a test.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKELTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DARDEN. Is the gentleman aware that under 1524 all Government employees, both from the Federal, State, and local are exempt? So the very bill here exempts all employees of any government.

Mr. SKELTON. If I may reclaim my time, I understand what the gentleman is saying. But we are speaking about people in their ordinary, day-to-day activities. I really think that it is an invasion of privacy of the greatest sort to be subjected to this.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON] has expired.

(On request of Mr. HERTEL of Michigan and by unanimous consent, Mr. SKELTON was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SKELTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HERTEL].

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. I just want to answer the gentleman from Georgia.

That is exactly the point: Why should we have different classifications in this country? Some people have to take it; some people do not have to take the test. If the test was so good, the courts would have recognized the results of the polygraph test.

The fact is it has come out in this debate and in past history that they are not 100 percent accurate nor anywhere near it. So we should not have different standards, and we should not say that some people are required to take this test to get a job or to keep their job.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKELTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DARDEN. I would respectfully point out, though, that you, as a Member of Congress, are actually exempt from a polygraph test under this.

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. That is my point. Why should I be exempt if we are going to stick it on somebody else if they have to take the test? We should be treated the same; we should not be exempt if we allow others to be required to take it.

Mr. DARDEN. Not under this bill; we are not treated the same under this very bill.

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. That is exactly my point: You are treating us differently under your own substitute, and under the bill because it is already an existing law. That is because the standard cannot be met for accuracy for taking and giving a polygraph test.

That is why we should oppose the substitute and not give, as the gentleman said, approval for these means of testing and denying employment of American citizens.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I thank the gentlewoman very much. I am sorry the gentleman from Missouri had to leave, but he made this statement, and I quote:

"That a polygraph examination is no better than the person who gives it." I think he has got a lot of merit there. The substitute that we offer today for H.R. 1524 provides professional requirements for those polygraph examiners.

We agree with him, and we want them to be qualified and professional in the way that they conduct their business.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, today we are discussing the issue of polygraph testing and its use and effectiveness in the workplace. At issue is not whether polygraph testing is good or bad—certainly we wish we lived in an ideal world where there was no need for such a tool, where employee theft and crime did not occur—but we don't reside in such a Utopia, and internal theft has cost the businesses of our country hundreds of millions of dollars a year—many more times the amount lost to robbery. We cannot escape the fact that ultimately it is the consumer who pays with increases in the cost of goods and services.

While we recognize that this imperfect world we live in necessitates the use of polygraph testing in certain situations, we also recognize that abuses can and do occur. Abuses occur where there are no standards for training and conducting the tests. Abuses occur when the rights of the individual being examined are not a priority.

The answer is to eliminate the abuses, not the uses of the polygraph. Polygraph testing in employment settings, be it prehire interviews or internal investigations, can be an effective device when used properly. It is an effective, albeit imperfect tool. It is certainly as reliable, if not more so, than the personal interview, where the one conducting the interview cannot avoid subjective deductions, and consciously or not, projects his or her values, likes and dislikes, while listening to the responses, and analyzing every movement, as well as the verbal and physical nuances. Are the person's eyes blinking too rapidly? Is he or she nervously shuffling papers? What does that mean? What message is being conveyed? What is the message received? Is it accurate? Can the conclusions drawn by the interviewer be completely objective and fair to the individual being questioned? Of course, there can be no such assurances.

In the House of Representatives we have recognized the legitimate use of the polygraph. We did this just last year when by an overwhelming vote of 333 to 71, we approved an amendment to the Department of Defense authorization bill, requiring polygraph testing to be used as a screening device with employees who have access to sensitive information. And since we have already acknowledged polygraph testing to be a legitimate and effective tool for the Government to use, how can we deny its credibility and effectiveness for the private sector? Surely we cannot condone such a double standard—strongly supporting legislation to allow and even require the Government to conduct polygraph tests on its employees and prospective employees, while saying to private businesses that the results of such testing are inaccurate and unfair, and therefore cannot be used? Obviously the use of polygraph testing has its proper place in both Government and private business, when used within certain guidelines.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Originally, it was not in the bill, but because there was a precedent set, or because there was that concern for national security and it was demonstrated by that vote that the gentlewoman alludes to, that when it was apparent to the author of the bill that there might be in the private sector that "like threat" to security, that is why Government entities dealing in national security defense contracting were allowed to be offered as an exemption and accepted by the author for the very same reasons.

But what we have done is exactly the same thing that we have done with national security and in the public work force. In the private work force, allow the like situation to exist for the equity to be there on both sides.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, tourism is Nevada's No. 1 industry and casino gaming is the major element in this industry—essential to my State's economy, which has the highest tourism dependency of any State in the Union—more than 80 percent of the tourist spending in our State comes from gaming. Obviously, Nevada has a vested interest in the integrity of these operations—both to protect the patrons and to protect State revenue generated from these operations.

The Nevada gaming industry, in full cooperation with our State regulators and law enforcement agencies, uses the polygraph along with other methods, to insure the integrity of applicants, employees, and overall operations. It is a tool the industry uses to police itself, and without it, our State gaming regulators and investigators will be further burdened and the blow to tourism, our major industry, will be severe——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Nevada [Mrs. VUCANOVICH] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mrs. VUCANOVICH was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. The polygraph provides a strong deterrent to theft and other misconduct that adversely affect the gaming industry. It has been an effective tool in controlling cash handling, drug trafficking, and other matters in cage, casino, and slot operations. In addition, the removal of criminal elements and dishonest personnel provides a positive boost to the morale of the vast majority of employees who are honest and law abiding. I have received over 100 letters from such employees who realize that the use of polygraphs is essential to the integrity of the industry and important to them as well.

The Young-Darden substitute, the Polygraph Reform Act of 1985, is the proper approach to regulating the use of polygraph testing, ensuring that examiners meet certain standards, while guaranteeing the rights of individuals being examined. The Young-Darden substitute recognizes the need to permit the use of polygraph testing, while at the same time recognizing the need to provide uniform, strict standards. It is a balanced bill, protecting both the employee and the employer. It is a moderate alternative, allowing the private sector the same protections afforded the Government.

This alternative bill is the reasonable answer to a critical problem that is growing and costing our businesses and the public untold millions of dollars each year. I strongly urge my colleagues to support the Young-Darden substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Nevada [Mrs. VUCANOVICH] has expired.

(On request of Mr. WILLIAMS and by unanimous consent, Mrs. VUCANOVICH was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We shared your concern, myself as sponsor of the legislation for which the substitute now stands, and members of the committee shared your concern about the ability or inability of gambling enterprises to polygraph their employees.

We called a company that owns one of the major casinos in both Nevada and New Jersey, and asked them if there was any difference in their losses and thefts between the casino which is in the State which allows polygraphing and the casino which is in the State that does not. They said, "No, there is no difference."

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Would you tell me who gave you that response?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The owners of Harrah's Club. Just a few days ago, if the gentlewoman will continue to yield, this was in the Las Vegas Sun, quoting:

Ridiculous contraptions that don't work are the words Steven Wynn used to describe polygraph machines. The Chief of the Golden Nugget goes on to say "That the policy of his company is that since the polygraph machine has been proven worthless, we don't use it."

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, let me say at the outset that I think I can count and I recognize that there are a lot of Members of this body committed to the legislation. I want to compliment the sponsors and I respect them all, but I think they are wrong.

I rise in support of the committee substitute, H.R. 3916.

Mr. Chairman, the subject of polygraph testing in the private sector has raised a controversy that is difficult to resolve.

On the one hand, the proponents of such testing point to the need to prevent dishonesty in the workplace. They say that polygraphs are an effective tool in discovering potential and current employees who could harm the company for which they work.

On the other hand, critics of polygraph point to the right of individual citizens to protect their thoughts and opinions from arbitrary invasion. They say that polygraphs are unreliable and therefore dangerous to the honest employee.

All of these people are partially correct in their views. This fact makes it all the more difficult to evaluate the substance of their claims.

H.R. 1524, in my view, goes too far in paying heed to the fears of polygraph opponents. This bill would make it impossible for the business community to benefit from polygraph testing that is conducted in a sensible way.

I believe that we can find a sensible way, and I believe this solution is to be found in the amendment, offered in the nature of a substitute, called H.R. 3916.

This amendment offers protection to individual rights while allowing employers the use of tests conducted with proper protection in mind.

H.R. 3916 sets minimum standards for the conduct and use of such testing:

It ensures that testing is voluntary.

It prohibits questions that pry into religion, race, political beliefs, sexual preferences, or activity in labor organizations.

The bill allows the examinee to stop the test at any time.

It requires testers to review their questions in advance with the persons they examine.

It states that employers may take no action based on test results alone.

The bill also guards test results from disclosure to unauthorized persons.

H.R. 3916 enforces these rules by allowing States and local governments to set up plans in line with the standards described in the bill. The Secretary of Labor will have power to enforce these plans. Those who violate the bill's standards will be subject to fines of $10,000 and to penalties described by the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

There is without doubt a public need to ensure employee honesty, especially in certain sectors of the economy. In pharmaceutical firms, for instance, the safety of the public depends largely on the protection of inventory. Dishonest employees must be prevented from gaining access to these stocks. The same is true for the banking industry, where millions of dollars in assets and transactions must be protected from misuse.

One major insurance company estimates that one-third of all business failures are caused by employee theft. This and other economic crime against business damages the economy by up to $200 billion annually.

Are polygraphs an effective solution to these problems? Private business has long recognized the great value of polygraph testing. The Committee on Education and Labor has determined that 2 million polygraph tests are administered in the private sector each year. This is more than all the examinations in criminal cases and in the Government combined.

During the last 10 years, the number of lie detector tests has tripled. Surveys have indicated that approximately 20 percent of all major businesses in the United States use polygraph testing. In banking, this figure reaches 50 percent. In retail operations, the figure is 60 percent.

The reputation of polygraph testing as a valuable tool is buttressed also by the use of such testing in almost all Federal law enforcement, intelligence and counterintelligence agencies.

All of these figures indicate that polygraph testing is a popular, widely recognized method of selecting potential employees and evaluating the honesty of employees in sensitive jobs. Passage of H.R. 1524 would unfairly prohibit private employers from using this widely recognized tool.

I urge my colleagues to vote instead for the amendment in the nature of a substitute, H.R. 3916. I wish to commend my colleagues BILL YOUNG and BUDDY DARDEN for their work on this substitute bill. It will protect the constitutional rights of polygraph subjects while guarding the legitimate rights of employers. Because this bill so well secures the rights of all the parties involved in polygraph testing, it deserves our approval.

I do not think that this Congress wants to say to American business that we reserve the right in the Federal Government to use a polygraph all that we want to, in every way in congressional offices, without any limitation whatever; but the American businessman shall not touch it. If the polygraph is the evil and sinister machine they say it is, then let us abolish it for every use.

How can we stand here and say to business in this country that the guy who operates a jewelry store cannot use a polygraph, but the Federal Government can.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LIVINSTON. I am happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment in the nature of a substitute to H.R. 1524 offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG]. The substitute takes the proper approach in dealing with use of the polygraph in the private sector—it does not ban such use, but it does require that such use meet specific standards designed to protect the interests of both employers and employees.

As ranking member on the Intelligence Committee and as a member of the Armed Services Committee, I have strongly supported the use of the polygraph in personnel security screening for sensitive national security programs. The Federal agencies which use the polygraph to protect the secrets involved in such programs have careful safeguards designed to protect the rights of employees and prospective employees who take a polygraph examination. The amendment offered by Mr. YOUNG would provide similar safeguards for the private sector.

I would note that the amendment offered by Mr. YOUNG has been crafted carefully to ensure that it does not impair national security polygraph programs, including contractor industrial security programs, conducted by Federal agencies.

I urge my colleagues to support the Young amendment in the nature of substitute.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Young-Darden substitute to H.R. 1524, and I wholeheartedly agree with the sponsors that a total ban on the use of polygraph tests by the private sector is inappropriate and dangerous. I believe that it is in everyone's interest that polygraph results be as accurate as possible. In my own State of Louisiana, laws have been passed which establish guidelines for training and licensing of polygraph examiners, set requirements for the equipment used in the test, and institute protections for the rights of those taking the exam.

As I have stated before, I don't see merit in any Federal involvement in this area at all, for I believe the States are fully capable of handling this matter, but at least, it would be better to pass legislation modeled on current State law requirements than to simply outlaw the use of the polygraph. That is why I support this substitute amendment.

This substitute provides strict standards for the use of polygraphs by employers in the private sector, governs how examinations may be conducted, and prohibits employers from taking any action based solely on the results of a polygraph test. In addition, this measure protects State programs already in effect and encourages the remaining States to set up programs of their own. I believe that if something must be done by the Federal Government in this area, the best way is to set up standards for the use of polygraphs rather than an outright ban.

There will be a number of amendments offered to exempt certain businesses from the provisions of this bill. In fact, H.R. 1524 itself provides for three exemptions from the total ban provisions included in the bill. But I would submit that opponents of polygraph tests are inconsistent in their arguments. On one hand they say that polygraph tests are not accurate enough to have any value, then they go right ahead and make exceptions to a total ban which in effect admit that there are legitimate uses for such tests.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 1524 is bad legislation, and I urge my colleagues to support the Young-Darden substitute amendment, so that if we are to take any action, the action we take will at least be reasonable.

Mr. Chairman, we had a colleague on the floor a little while ago who had some questions that I would now propound on his behalf, since he could not stay, to the gentleman from Florida, one of the coauthors of the amendment.

Section 5, subsection (a)(1) of the amendment provides that an employee or prospective employee who is asked to take a polygraph shall sign a notification stating, among other things, that "such examinee is consenting voluntarily to take the examination".

I would like to ask the maker of the amendment, is the intent of that language to provide that an employee or prospective employee must voluntarily agree to take a polygraph examination?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, my answer is "yes," that is exactly our intent.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It must be voluntary?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And if the employee or prospective employee declines and refuses the polygraph, may the employer take any employment action—such as firing, denying a promotion, refusing to hire, or any disciplinary action—because of or based on the refusal?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. No, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Similarly, section 5, subsection (a)(3) requires the employee or prospective employee to be informed that he or she may terminate the examination at any time after it has begun. Is the intent of this language that no employment action may be taken against the employee or prospective employee for terminating the examination?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. If the gentleman will yield, yes, that is the intent.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Section 7 of the amendment provides for certification of state or local plans for regulating the use of polygraphs. Subsection (3) of that section requires that such plan "provide assurances that [the] standards and the enforcement of [the] standards [in the state or local] plan shall be at least as effective as the standards set out in this Act". Is the intent of that language that states and/or local governments may enact, or maintain if they have previously enacted, laws or regulations more strict than the language of this bill, including, if the state or the local government so chooses, to totally ban the use of polygraphs?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. That is the intent and the effect of the Young-Darden substitute.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's response.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding, because I have some questions along those lines.

I am deeply troubled by some of the provisions of this law; in particular, one that the gentleman was referring to with respect to whether or not a person could be dismissed or fired or whatever; however, the way I read the law, and I would like to be corrected if I am not correct, is that a person who refuses to take any examination could be not hired or could be fired.

Now, that is the way I read the law, and if I am incorrect, I would appreciate being corrected.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is certainly not my understanding, as I understood the answer of the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to certainly state that under no circumstances can the polygraph be the sole determinant as to whether someone is not hired or discharged. The substitute specifically prohibits using the polygraph as the sole determinant.

Mr. JEFFORDS. That is not my question, though, if the gentleman will yield.

My question is, based upon the wording of sections 4, 5, and 6, it appears to me that although if a person consents to and takes the examination, you could not use that as a sole reason for not hiring or for firing; but it does not answer the question that appears to me from reading that, that you could refuse to hire or you could fire someone if they refuse to take the polygraph examination. That is quite a different question and that is the way I read the amendment.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I would inform the gentleman that under the bill as written and the intent of the authors of the bill, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG] and I, is that refusal to take the polygraph in no way could jeopardize or in any way cause a person not to be hired or discharged.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, if I can reclaim my time, certainly the gentleman can get his own time in a few minutes, I would simply say that that is not my understanding in my reading of the bill and certainly that is not what I would intend as I rise here to support this substitute. I think it is a good substitute.

More importantly, I think that this is truly a matter that can easily be resolved——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. LIVINGSTON was allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, it appears quite apparent that this is a matter that can easily be resolved on an ad hoc basis in each individual State.

Here we are again sitting here in the hub of the Nation, in the Nation's Capital, dipping into the province of State legislatures. There is no reason in the world why this bill should be before us, but since it is, I certainly wholeheartedly endorse the Young-Darden substitute and ask my colleagues to support it.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in opposition to the substitute.

Mr. Chairman, let me first say that I think an employer does have a legitimate grievance when he interviews a prospective employee. He is at somewhat of a disadvantage when he is trying to ascertain whether or not that person is credible as to an issue of whether he will steal or not from that employer. What we do know about these machines, however, is that they are fallible. What we do know is that these machines can be misdirected if a person's temperature is wrong, if their body chemistry happens to be a certain way, if the operator is not well trained, if the machine is not working that day. We know that machine is fallible.

What we also need to appreciate I think in this debate is what these statistics mean in the real world. For 4 years I worked in the district attorney's office in the Houston area. Most of that time I prosecuted organized crime cases, drug organizations, robbery and theft rings and organized crime. We took most of the cases from the investigative stage through to trial.

In one particular case I tried an alleged robber. This young person went up to a photo booth in a parking lot in a sweatsuit with a hood pulled down over his face, and pointed a pistol at a young 20-year-old woman and demanded her money. The robbery took maybe 60 seconds, maybe a minute and a half. The robber left with the money and ran away.

The young woman later picked the suspect out of a lineup and insisted that, "Yes, that is the person that robbed me that day."

The defendant had five alibi witnesses and he insisted on taking a lie detector test. The Houston Police Department administered that test and he passed it with flying colors.

We were prepared to dismiss the case, but the young woman insisted, "That is the guilty man that robbed me that day," and I tried the lawsuit.

When the jury came back with a verdict of 25 years a young lawyer leaned forward (that was sitting behind me in the courtroom) and asked, "Do you really think he did it? Do you really think he was guilty?"

Everyone in the courtroom knew of the lie detector test except for the jury that heard the evidence.

A few weeks later this defendant was brought manacled into the courtroom to receive his formal sentencing and be sent away to the penitentiary, and as he stood in the back of the room and looked up to the bench, to the judge that was about to sentence him, he leaned over to the bailiff and whispered in his ear and said, "You know, if I had killed that girl that day, I would never be here now."

These machines do not work and it is time that this Congress stands up and says something about them. Make no mistake about it, if you vote for this substitute you are certifying this equipment. You are certifying these faulty machines.

I urge defeat of this substitute and a vote in support of this important legislation.

□ 1730

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairmank will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 1524, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act.

I am opposing this bill not because I doubt the stories of abusive employment practices which have taken place throughout the workplace due to increased reliance on a sometimes inaccurate and unreliable procedure, but because I do not believe that Congress should be creating two classes of individuals in relation to polygraph tests generally.

If, as many have testified, the overwhelming body of evidence suggests that these tests are unscientific, inaccurate, and unreliable in the workplace and, therefore, should be prohibited in the private sector, then why are we permitting their use—in any form—against only Government employees. Aside from the obvious flawed logic behind this position, a vote for this bill is a vote to allow discrimination in the workplace against all Government employees whether they are local, State, or Federal.

Instead of pretending this inconsistency is premised on some tremendous concern about the recent rash of espionage cases, this House would do well to direct its attentions to screening methods of those public employees in sensitive national security positions which promise a degree of reliability and usefulness in which we feel confident.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I certainly commend the previous speaker for his excellent statement and somewhat emotional statement.

I would like to try to clearly draft where the issues are here in my mind. I might well have been able to support a substitute which provided some more leeway for the States. However, I just cannot support this substitute.

The bill that we have before us, the original bill, basically eliminates the use of polygraphs in employment practices except under certain circumstances, some of which we have already provided in the bill and some of which would be provided later on, which have to do with national security and health and safety issues where the public may be threatened in that sense. Thus, we recognize that although generally these are not reliable, they may be of some help, under those circumstances, to raise some questions which should be investigated where national security and health and safety issues are involved.

However, we have an extremely different situation with respect to the original bill and the substitute. The difference is simply this: The bill before you, by the committee, eliminates the use of polygraphs for employment practices except in certain situations. The substitute gives a right to conduct polygraph exams in all cases except where there might be some violations of the rules and regulations set out.

That is a vast difference, and the question is whether we want to give a right here to businesses to conduct polygraph exams. I do not believe we do.

For instance, there is a hybrid system in the substitute which allows Federal, State, and local agencies to conduct polygraph exams, and it might have been better had they left the original bill the way it was wherein they had to be approved by the Department of Labor for those plans, but they have struck that out and they have said, instead, that it is deemed to have been approved when you submit an administrative plan. That is one problem.

It appears to me that by invoking the commerce clause in section 2(1) and then going on with respect, under section 3, to set forth the uses of polygraphs, that they have, in effect, said that States themselves cannot prohibit the use of polygraphs.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I will if I have time at the end, but the other side has gone through and said the opposite. I would like to bring out these points.

There is going to be a substantial cost to this amendment, and none to the original bill. It is going to cost the Department of Labor somewhere, according to the CBO, between $1 and $2 million to administer it, and that is an unnecessary cost. It is much better to go with the approach of the bill.

Also, as I previously pointed out, and I will not go over it again, it appears to me very clear that under this bill if someone refuses to take the polygraph exam, they can be refused to be hired or can be fired. I do not agree or see anything which says otherwise.

It protects the present polygraph licensees; whereas, new polygraphers must perform internships and take exams previous to continuing. Some it exempts and grandfathers. Those may be bad polygraph examiners who have performed more than 200 exams for a whole year.

Also, although it claims to allow different kinds of polygraph examinations in section 3(a), it then eliminates the use of anything except those currently being used by the polygraph examiners.

It precludes the private right of action under 14(b), and I would point out this is probably just a drafting error, but on that section, by referring to a section instead of the act, it practically eliminates all enforcement and all utilization of the relief.

Under 14(a), if you take a look, if you have a violation, ordinarily if there is a violation of an agent of a company, that liability goes to the corporation or the business. Under this it just goes to the polygraph examiner, which probably eliminates any effect of relief.

So I think there are a lot of problems with this bill, but the basic problem with me is the very basic question of do we want to eliminate polygraph exams as being used for hiring practices except under very narrow provisions under the bill before us, and perhaps some to be added relative to national security and health and safety, or would we allow companies not to hire somebody because they refuse to take a polygraph exam? I think that is the basic difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] has expired.

(On request of Mr. DARDEN and by unanimous consent, Mr. JEFFORDS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DARDEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman aware that under the substitute that the States can still totally prohibit the use of polygraphs in their respective States and that the States, in fact, can be even more restrictive than the minimum Federal standards set forth in the substitute?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I would appreciate it if the gentleman would point that wording out to me because I cannot find it in the bill and the people we have shown it to cannot find it.

Can the gentleman tell me which section it is that says that the States can prohibit?

Mr. DARDEN. If the gentleman will yield further, we will make that available to him.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, on the other technical question that the gentleman had asked, I would like to respond if he would allow me.

Sections 4 and 5 need to be read together, because section says that:

> No employer may take any action affecting the employment status of an employee or prospective employee, if such action is based on the results of a polygraph examination of such employee or prospective employee * * *.

In section 5, the first subparagraph says——

Mr. JEFFORDS. Hold on. If I may reclaim my time, it goes on to say "that has not been administered in accordance with sections 5 and 6 of this act."

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. That is the point I am getting to. That is correct. But in section 5, subsection (1) says, "such examinee is consenting voluntarily to take the examination." So if he volunteers to take it or if he does not volunteer to take it, that would be an action referred to in section 4.

So the employer may not take any action affecting that employment status based on section 5, subsection (1).

Mr. JEFFORDS. But that is not the way I read it, because suppose he refuses to take the exam?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Section 5, subsection (1), says that the exam is voluntary.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Right. So he has refused to take it. It is not voluntary.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. And section 4 says that his status cannot be affected by a test given in conjunction with section 5, which says that it is voluntary.

Mr. JEFFORDS. But it does not say that if he does not take it that that cannot be used as a reason for not hiring him.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I think "voluntary" means you can take it or you cannot take it. It is up to the person being examined.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I hope the gentleman is right, but that is certainly not the way I read it.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to this amendment.

Quite frankly, the idea of formal standards for polygraph testing has a good deal of appeal on the surface, but those of us who have heard testimony about the abuse, misuse, and overuse of polygraph testing in the private sector know that standards are simply not enough. We need responsible, yet strict limitations on the use of polygraph testing and once the amendment process is completed here today, a process I will be involved in, I am confident that H.R. 1524 will meet that objective.

The American Polygraph Association estimates that more than two million polygraph tests are being given each year, 98 percent of which are being given by private business. That number is very troubling to me. Consider, for example, that our Nation's largest private security services provider, a company employing some 55,000 security personnel, gave only 900 polygraph tests in 1984. They have testified before our committee that they use these tests on a very selective basis, and in no case is a person denied employment or dismissed solely on the results of a polygraph examination.

Certainly, there is no company in the private business sector that could establish any greater need for the polygraph test. Why, then, do we have more than 2 million of these tests being conducted each year? Are they really necessary? My close study of this issue says no.

Not only are these tests being overused, but I am familiar with too many cases of a lie detector test being used as the sole determinant of whether a person is hired for a particular job. That is particularly bothersome, since we know that tens of thousands of workers are wrongfully denied employment every year, either because they refused to take the polygraph test on principle or because the inaccuracies in the process have falsely judged that individual.

Admittedly, there are certain industries in our Nation that have demonstrated a proven need for the polygraph. These industries include the security industry, the pharmaceutical industry, and Government intelligence agencies. But, exemptions for these industries have either already been established in this bill, or will be established in the bill today. I am satisfied with those exemptions. They provide for the responsible and necessary use of the polygraph, while allowing the remaining provisions in the bill to prevent the abuse, misuse, and overuse of the lie detector test. This is a very fair and balanced approach.

The Darden-Young substitute falls short of the mark. Standards will not be able to prevent the unscrupulous employer from pressuring employees or prospective employees from "volunteering" to take the test, and standards will not prevent the unscrupulous employer in States that prohibit the tests to simply send job seekers to a neighboring State to take the test and, Mr. Chairman, these types of abuses are occurring.

The American work force deserves our support and protection. H.R. 1524 sends the right message, the Darden-Young substitute does not. I urge my colleagues to oppose this amendment.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1524, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act, which would prohibit most uses of the polygraph in private sector employment. Passage of H.R. 1524 will protect millions of American workers—and their employers—from the abuses associated with a misplaced reliance on the polygraph machine as a "lie detector."

I want my position to be perfectly clear. If there really were such a thing as a valid lie detector, I would not be opposed to its use, just as I am not opposed to background checks and other investigations designed to determine whether employees are lying or truthful. If an employee tells an employer, "I am a high school graduate" or "I have never used narcotics" the employer has every right to investigate whether the employee is telling the truth. But a polygraph machine won't provide the answer.

According to the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment, as employment screening devices, polygraph tests give wrong answers nearly as often as they give correct answers. The result is that thousands of innocent, talented potential employees are unfairly denied, jobs, while employers are falsely lulled into hiring thousands of undersirable people who manage to pass their polygraph tests.

It is no wonder that the past chairman of the Georgia Board of Polygraph Examiners testified that he would be unwilling to take a polygraph test in his State if his job and career were to depend on the results.

No scientifically valid study has ever shown that polygraph tests can detect lies. What studies there are indicate that polygraphs wrongly identify innocent subjects from 5 to 88 percent of the time. Thus, even under the best of circumstances, 5 innocent individuals in 100 will be labled as guilty, denied a job, or fired. In the worst scenario, 88 innocent people out of 100 would be incriminated.

It is no surprise that in the overwhelming majority of State and Federal courts, polygraph tests are inadmissible as evidence unless all parties consent to their admissibility. Many courts, includng those in my own State of Michigan, will not permit the use of polygraph tests as evidence even when the parties stipulate to their admissibility. The courts do not admit polygraph evidence because there is no way to determine its reliability. Employers interested in an accurate evaluation of their employees should follow the courts' example.

It is wrong to allow employers, however well-intentioned they might be, to subject job applicants or employees to the Russian roulette of polygraph testing. The congressional Office of Technology Assessment estimates that as many as 50,000 innocent employees lose their jobs each year because of inaccurate polygraph tests, while large numbers of guilty employees—shoplifters and embezzlers—are wrongly exonerated. Employers lose both ways, by retaining bad employees and by losing valuable, honest, and loyal employees.

Regulation of polygraph testing is no answer. Regulation cannot transform the polygraph test into a valid lie detector. It can only create a false aura of validity and encourage more employers to rely on polygraph testing. I urge my colleagues to defeat the Young and Darden substitute and to vote for H.R. 1524.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the Darden-Young substitute amendment. This amendment would create a Federal regulatory scheme for the polygraph practice in the private sector and, in doing so, would legitimize it as an accepted part of the American workplace.

As I have indicated previously, the polygraph has no acceptable place in the screening of workers who are not under suspicion of wrongdoing. The practice of polygraph screening itself is fundamentally flawed from a scientific standpoint and inherently abusive under American principles of justice.

The American Psychological Association has condemned polygraph screening by its members as unethical. The Darden-Young substitute, however, authorizes the practice; its regulatory approach is a wolf in sheep's clothing. Under its terms, every private polygrapher in the country who runs American workers through his pseudoscientific tests, will have a Federal certificate of approval on his wall.

I urge defeat of this amendment.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today to discuss this issue because it concerns me greatly that we are in the process of making a choice between competing public interests, and we seem to be having a great deal of difficulty getting the disection of the two competing interests clearly laid before the Members. I would like to do that, and reason hopefully with my colleagues about where we ought to be going on the Young-Darden amendment and on this bill.

I do not think there is any question but that there are those who rightfully point to the fact that polygraph examinations—lie detector examinations—are not always accurate. They never have been and they probably never will be. It is not an absolute science.

In the area of criminal law, I have dealt with those. I remember doing this when I was on active duty in the military. They certainly are not going to be acceptable, and they should not be in the course of a criminal prosecution where the proof is beyond a reasonable doubt in order to convict a person who is accused of a crime. But they have been used successfully by our law enforcement officials in the process of criminal prosecutions in behalf of the accused in situations that I have been involved in, and I am sure many others around the country have been. That is when there is some questionable evidence involved in the case and the accused himself oftentimes is allowed the opportunity to present a polygraph examination, conducted by a reputable lie detector giver of that examination, and he comes out according to that exam as saying that he is speaking the truth and the benefit of the doubt is given to him, and he is then oftentimes faced with no charges. The charges are dropped.

Now let us look at what we are talking about today. We are not talking about the criminal world. We are talking about the civilian world. We are talking about lawsuits, we are talking about employment. We are talking about business opportunities and business interests and the public interests.

What are the public interests here? There is a public interest, no question about it, being argued by the committee bill out here today and those who would argue against this amendment. There is a public interest in reducing the possible abuse of the polygraph. We do not want to see it abused, and it can be abused in the sense that an employer would discriminate in its use, or in the sense that somebody who does not know how it is being used, or how to administer it properly, asks the wrong questions or does not effectively ask the questions at all. No question, a preemployment screening can be abusive, or a screening of any sort under the polygraph.

That interest, though, and how often it occurs has to be weighed against the very strong public interests in many sectors of our society today to be able to screen out people who would be thieves, people who would steal from companies, people who would steal from the public because these companies represent the public interest. And it is when weighing these interests that we get in trouble drawing that line. How do you write a bill like this one that draws that line? I think you can see the difficulty by the number of exceptions that are created in this bill, and the number of exceptions that apparently are going to be seen on amendments that will follow if this one is not adopted, all kinds of concerns over the pharmaceutical industry, for example. The Drug Enforcement Administration says one-half million or a million doses of drugs are stolen every year by employees of pharmacies and wholesale drug manufacturers and distributors. This increases the cost of drugs to consumers.

Imagine the cutback in expenditures for drugs elderly people on fixed incomes could experience if the drug manufacturers could cut back on those theft losses? The National Association of Chain Drugstores estimates consumers pay 10 to 15 percent more for drugs to cover losses from internal theft.

We have had one amendment to this bill in committee dealing with this. We are probably going to have another one on the floor today to allow the opportunity to have polygraph examinations used in connection with pharmaceuticals. That is just one example of where it needs to be.

I understand there may be another one dealing with the armored car deliveries of cash. Frankly, we need to look at the whole area of financial services where we have got problems with money laundering. Where else is the public interest greater in not having thieves than in our banking world today where 80 percent of the internal losses of banks in this country each year are from internal theft; $382 million last year in losses in banks for that reason, not to mention the vulnerability of the public to money laundering of drug dealings in cash through the process of our financial institutions.

There are a myriad of those. There are no exceptions in this bill for that. I could go on and on and on, as many will do today if this amendment does not pass, and lay out the litany of examples of where we have a public interest in allowing the polygraph to be used, even though there is a competing interest that says maybe we should do away with it. We have got to have those exceptions to protect the public.

It seems to me that under the circumstances of this, with the national security interests already excepted, with Government employees in many cases already excepted, with the dual standard being created by this legislation that the logical thing, rather than create this whole long list of exceptions that we otherwise would have to do in this bill, and just let a few people have them, it seems to me that the logical thing to do rather than to create this whole additional laundry list of exceptions where the public interest has to be weighed more heavily in favor of using the polygraph against the other aspects of the public interest involved that we adopt a broad policy statement in this legislation that puts some limits and checks on the users of polygraphs, that requires certification of the persons who are administering them and of the parameters to which the testing may go as far as questions asked and so forth. That is what the Young-Darden amendment does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. McCOLLUM] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. McCOLLUM was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. McCOLLUM. This is the sensible way to approach the abuses in the polygraph given in the private industry of this country, and I urge may colleagues to think about this for a minute. I think when you do, you will realize that rather than riddling this bill full of exceptions hither and yon, the logical thing to do is to pass the comprehensive approach that Young-Darden allows to correct the abuses without killing off the good and necessary part of giving lie detector tests to those in private industry who are employees in very sensitive areas.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, how can Congress support limited use of the polygraph as a counterespionage tool by the Government and still pass this legislation which severely restricts polygraph use by private employers?

The answer lies in the profound difference in the scope of polygraph examinations, the rights of the individuals subject to the examination, the uses of the test results, and the training and certification of polygraph examiners between the Federal Government counterintelligence and private sector employment polygraphs. Consider the differences:

SCOPE OF EXAMINATIONS

The Federal counterintelligence examination involves six specific relevant questions concerning contact with hostile intelligence services. There are no relevant lifestyle questions and the control questions are designed to be nonintrusive. Private employment polygraph exams usually concentrate on honesty and use of drugs and alcohol. The questions are often quite intrusive. Unnecessarily embarrassing questions produce far more false positive than do less intrusive questions. Further, the Federal program involves extensive pretest interviews during which every question to be asked will be reviewed. Not necessarily so in the private sector.

RIGHTS OF INDIVIDUALS

In the Federal program, individuals who refuse to take the examination are ordinarily reassigned to other, less sensitive work, without loss of pay. There are no such protections in the private sector. Federal civilian and military personal have the right to counsel outside the examination room, they are reminded of their privilege against self-incrimination, and they are not asked about religion, politics, or personal beliefs, all interviews are recorded and all charts are reviewed by a second or third examiner. The results are never communicated outside a very small group of officials. Virtually none of these protections exist in the private sector.

USE OF RESULTS

No action can be taken against an individual based solely on the results of a polygraph examination. Deceptive results can lead to further investigation, but, unless the deception is substantiated by external investigation, no adverse action is taken. In the private sector, the charts are often the only determining factor. Frequently, charts are not reviewed by a second examiner. And, unlike the Federal Government where the questions are repeated three times to assure the accuracy of results, often a single response will be considered decisive in the private sector.

EXAMINER CERTIFICATION AND TRAINING

The Federal Government requires completion of a 14-week training program, including the live administration of 50 exams, and a 6-month internship. States have varying standards. Yet, there are no private-sector training courses which involve the live administration of anywhere near 50 exams. The Federal Government requires a B.A. degree and 2 years of investigative experience. There are no such private-sector requirements.

I am not a big fan of the Federal counterintelligence polygraph program. It is very expensive and the reliability of the polygraph for counterintelligence screening is not supported by any valid research.

Still, a responsible, limited program, when used in conjunction with other security measures, may make sense. Permitting the widespread use of poor quality polygraphs in the private sector to determine the employment future of millions of Americans is nothing short of scandal. The bill before us today corrects that problem.

My State of Colorado has no standards for polygraph givers, so employers may be paying for poor quality, but worse, an employee may be labeled for life by incorrect results.

So what happens is you can have people with no experience go out and make terrible mistakes, and it is the employees who will then pay for the rest of their lives.

So, I think that is why the substitute is majorly flawed. I had tried to figure out how to put an amendment on it, but could not in time. The bill is majorly flawed because it does not deal with the States that have no criteria; and by passing this, it is really giving a feel of congressional approval to the utilization of polygraphs in the private sector, and I think that is a very dangerous thing to do.

I hope the substitute will not pass, because it goes in the wrong direction by not having that very vital protection. The machine is one thing, but the machine is only as good as the person who uses it, and many States have not dealt with that. So to have a Federal mandate that we should start moving down that road is wrong and to say that, well, we are just doing this because the Federal Government could do it is also not accurate because the Federal Government has very stringent standards.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding. In the beginning, I thought she was speaking for our substitute. She is correct, that presently there are no standards that exist in the private sector, while they are stringent in the Federal sector.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I am talking about standards, reclaiming my time, standards for the training of the polygraph examiners.

Now, had the gentleman brought in, say, DOD Directive No. 5210.48, which is the Federal Government's, then we would know what that standard was, but there is not a standard in there. You defer to the States and many States have no standards.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. If the gentlewoman will yield, on page 6 of our substitute, we provide that a polygraph examiner must be at least 21 years of age, a citizen of the United States, a person of good moral character, in compliance with all laws, rules and regulations of any appropriate State or local government governing use of the polygraph, holds a B.A. degree from an accredited college or university, has successfully completed a formal training course in use of polygraph that has been approved by the Secretary, and has completed a polygraph examiner internship of at least 6 months duration under the direct supervision of a polygraph examiner who has met the requirements of this section.

I think we have to have these stringent requirements.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. If the Federal Government is looked at, they have a much more stringent one, and I can point out what that is, it is a 14-week training course, it includes 50 live examinations, a 6-month internship and the administration of anywhere near 50 exams, a B.A. degree, and 2 years of investigative experience.

I think that that is a much stricter standard, and I think if we are going to compare oranges and apples, we should have exactly the same standard that we have in the Federal Government.

Otherwise, I think we have a major loophole that people can get through, and that concerns me.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. If the gentlewoman will yield, I agree with that. Our standards are not quite as strict as those of the Defense Department, but they are far stricter than any that exist today, because basically throughout the country there are practically no standards at all.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I think that when we go ahead and say that we are going to do this, we should have it at least at the same level if we are going to say we are doing it in the private sector, because they do it in the Federal sector.

As I say, in the Federal sector, we also have all sorts of other protections such as the rights of individuals; the availability of counsel; and so forth and so on, and it is very well laid out.

That I do not see, and as I say, I will put all of this in the RECORD; but that I do not see as an equivalent, and I really worry that that could allow some abuse.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. If the gentlewoman would yield just one more time, I would request respectfully that she read section 4 and 5 of this——

Mrs. SCHROEDER. The gentlewoman has read the section, and that is what I am pointing out.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I think you will find that——

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Is that it is not the same. I wish it were the same. It is not the same, and I am saying if we are talking about saying we are doing this because we do it in the Federal sector, then it should be the same. And that is all I am saying.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. But once again, it is far better than the nonexistent protections——

Mrs. SCHROEDER. It is stil not the same level of protection that we give to Federal employees, and I think we should make it the same or we cannot use that as an argument.

Mr. SWINDALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, as a former practicing attorney and as a private business owner, I rise in support of the Darden-Young substitute, and in opposition to the committee version for the simple reason that I think today more than any other issue, business men and women in this country are concerned about this continuing attitude in Washington, DC that somehow folks in Washington have better sense than folks back home.

H.R. 1524 is a classic example of that type of mentality, that somehow we have got to continue to set standards out of Washington; in this case completely usurping the right of the private sector to use a polygraph is at least part of a multifaceted process of determining not only qualifications for employment, but also in determining how to best contain theft losses which ultimately benefits the public at large.

What concerns me about 1524 is, it just continues to usurp the same rights that individuals I think repeatedly have stated at least if you go to my district and talk to individuals, that they would be perfectly satisfied if they could just go about the business of running their business with the least amount of interference from Washington, DC.

The substitute that has been offered by Mr. YOUNG and Mr. DARDEN I think addresses the real hearts of the concerns of those individuals who feel that polygraphs have been abused; but it does not go so far as to outlaw that provision; it does set some very rational standards, and even sets forth some remedies that do not exist under current law.

For the reason, Mr. Chairman, I think that we do a tremendous disservice not only for businesspersons in this country, but to consumers who will ulitmately bear the cost of this bill in the sense that there will be taken away a very substantive way that individuals can regulate losses in their businesses.

The last point I would make is that no employer under this substitute would be authorized to take any action solely of the basis of a polygraph test.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWINDALL. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. I would just like to make a point that I did not have a chance to make, again in support of the Young-Darden substitute. Our colleague from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS] referred to the fact that all of the casinos in my State did not feel this was important, and I did want to make the point that 90 percent of the northern Nevada casinos want to have the ability to use the polygraph, and 70 percent of the southern Nevada casinos support it.

Our colleague also referred to a casino owner, a Mr. Steve Wynn, who has a casino in the southern part of our State, in Las Vegas, and said that the casinos that use polygraph and the casinos that do not, there is no loss difference; and I would like to know how in the world anyone can measure that. If the money is stolen, how are you going to be able to tell?

So I think the importance is that the private businesses such as casinos who handle money as they do, money loses its name once it leaves your hand; cash does. If we can have the ability in our State and private industry where it is in compliance with our State law, it is a very important tool, and it is obviously not the only tool.

I thank you very much for the time.

Mr. SWINDALL. Two other points that I would like to make very briefly, Mr. Chairman are: First, the inconsistence of H.R. 1524. On the one hand it argues that polygraph tests are somehow invalid and then on the other hand it argues an exemption in a number of categories, mostly relating to the public sector. How can it be invalid in the private sector but yet have validity in the public sector?

The other attitude that bothers me about this bill is this same prevailing attitude that State governments and local governments are incapable of not only noting problems, but solving the problems.

I happen to believe very strongly that our local elected officials are very capable of addressing these problems, and do not need our help.

I will yield to Mr. YOUNG.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. During the debate of our colleague from Texas [Mr. ANDREWS] he made what I thought was an effective argument against the position that I support.

I want to have an opportunity to respond to that, because I did not want to let it go unanswered.

He made the point that machines are fallible, and I agree with that. God knows the families of the seven crew members of the shuttle Challenger know that machines are fallible.

He also said that these machines do not work.

(On request of Mr. YOUNG of Florida and by unanimous consent, Mr. SWINDALL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr YOUNG of Florida. If the gentleman will yield, in that argument after saying that machines are fallible, he also said that polygraph machines do not work. But at the same time, H.R. 1524, the vehicle that he supports in opposition to our substitute, allows the use of the unworkable machine by the Defense Department, which we support of course.

He is also prepared, as are the sponsors of H.R. 1524, to allow the use of this supposedly unworkable machine for FBI contractors.

□ 1800

They are willing to allow the supposedly unworkable machine in the use of those dealing with drugs. I understand they are also prepared to accept exemptions for public utilities, public security services, armored car personnel, uniformed security personnel, the jewelry business, the legalized gaming business, aviation employees, and banks. I understand that they are prepared to allow exemptions for this supposedly unworkable machine for many, many types of industry. I think that is inconsistent. I would like to close this argument by saying that what we are trying to do with the Young-Darden substitute is not only protect against the criminal, but also to protect the innocent who might lose his job if he was not able to have access or if the industry was not able to have access to the use of the polygraph. We believe by having a professional approach to using the polygraph with a legal safeguard for the person being examined that we are protecting the innocent and we are protecting the consumer who pays more than $40 billion a year now because of internal theft.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SWINDALL was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SWINDALL. In my own business, I have repeatedly used the polygraph to protect individuals in situations where they are suspect. I, for one, have on numbers of occasions hired former felons and one of their protections is, when an individual accuses them wrongly, they can go to a polygraph examination and vindicate themselves, and they, I know from personal experience, have applauded the use of that to vindicate themselves.

I would certainly hate to see us take away that very valid method of vindication.

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the substitute.

Mr. Chairman, the substitute seeks to curb polygraph abuse by regulating the testing procedure and licensing polygraph operators. I believe that polygraph tests are basically abusive. H.R. 3916 would only legitimize the Federal Government's approval of what I think is an unscientific subjective procedure that, by its very nature, violates some of the fundamental principles of our Constitution: the presumption of innocence, the right of privacy, and the privilege against self-incrimination that we all have.

Experience by a lot of us, and I have served as a prosecutor and as a U.S. magistrate and as a practicing attorney, experience shows that polygraph licensing and regulatory statutes will not work and do not work. I also believe that the rights provided by H.R. 3916 are meaningless in practice and you have got to ask yourself how voluntary can polygraph examiners really be when H.R. 3916, the substitute, allows employers to require workers and job applicants to take polygraph tests to keep or get their jobs. Does that seem voluntary to you? The requirements for a polygraph license imposed by the substitute are so weak that a polygrapher could obtain a polygraph license without even a high-school education.

But the true purpose of the polygraph is, what? I submit to you, it is basically to intimidate people. Most information obtained from a polygraph interrogation is obtained before the examinee is even hooked up to the polygraph machine because they are so afraid of the machine.

The real way to effectively protect people from the intimidation of the polygraph is, how? It is to ban its use.

The procedure and the machine are flawed, not reliable. We should not play with this kind of thing. Let us protect our constitutional rights.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I have served some 34 years in naval intelligence, and I think I have experienced some number of individuals who have operated a polygraph and who have carried on polygraph examinations in connection with the principles administered and proposed in the other legislation which exempts the Federal Government employees and defense operations of the Nation but somehow the idea of utilizing the polygraph in local governments or in businesses is said to be wrong.

The point was made by the gentleman who spoke just a moment ago that if it is so wrong, why is it OK in the other bill? The idea of a polygraph is not that you run everybody through it to see how many people are lying. You use it simply when you have some individual whom you may suspect of some nefarious activity. A polygraph usually ends up at the end of the line when you make a final determination.

I think there is a good deal of misunderstanding that if somebody loses something, you are going to run everybody through the polygraph and try to find out who was guilty and who was not. Why are we objecting to the idea of utilizing it in business? In fact, in recent years, we have seen all kinds of businesses which have been preyed upon. There have been banks that have had individuals taking money out of the banks.

We have had the kind of industrial espionage that has taken place in the case of a couple of companies in Japan coming over here to the United States.

Our business, our whole procedure of keeping American businesses going indicates that there are many opportunities for sabotage, for larceny, all of these other things. In fact, a number of bills and amendments have been offered to protect airlines, to protect utilities. All of these things are subject to sabotage. This is the very kind of a procedure that can work out as effectively as it does in the Government operations in the individual States and communities. This bill is a bill that would encourage States who have not set up any programs for operating this kind of detection to go ahead in this field under appropriate standards.

I think it is this kind of legislation that will help American businesses and will reduce the type of wrongdoing that we have been seeing in the business sector in recent months and recent years.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. THOMAS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Young-Darden substitute and in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the possibility of polygraph abuse can be a problem, as we have heard in testimony before our committees and as we read in newspaper accounts. We need legislation to address this potential abuse, and I believe that the best approach is contained in the substitute offered by Mr. YOUNG and Mr. DARDEN.

This substitute bill has a number of protections for those taking the exams. And it also represents a much more appropriate "federalist" approach to solving this problem.

Historically, States assume the responsibility to regulate and license those who deliver services to their citizens. Utilities are regulated by the States. Insurance companies and real estate brokers are licensed by States, as are doctors, lawyers, dentists, and other professionals. The States assume the duty to protect their citizens and to fine-tune regulations to cover their particular needs and circumstances.

Polygraph examiners fit into this same category of professionals offering services to businesses and individuals. At least 30 States have passed legislation to regulate the polygraph industry by licensing examiners and setting standards for exams.

The States' right to govern themselves should be respected. State legislators are working to develop legislation which protects the rights of examinees, establishes training guidelines for examiners, and restricts the kinds of questions that can be asked so the personal lives of examinees are not invaded.

The Young-Darden substitute would encourage other States to follow suit and would set up clear guidelines for States to institute the kinds of protections that examinees need. It seems to me that this approach is much more responsible than the committee bill blanket prohibition against polygraph use in the private sector.

The polygraph has been used for decades by businesses that have particular security problems. Many of these businesses are likely to get exemptions from the committee bill so they can continue to use the exams. That means that tens of thousands of employees and job applicants would continue to be subject to potential abuses.

The committee bill simply won't work in the real world. The polygraph will continue to be used, and instances of polygraph abuse could continue unless we do something. Prohibition is not the answer. What will work is legislation that is carefully drafted and which recognizes the practical needs of American business and that is sensitive to the potential harm that can be done to examinees by improperly trained testers or others who abuse test results.

I believe that the States are best able to consider all of these needs and to find the balance that works best for their citizens. The States should have the authority to pass their own bills, using the guidelines set out in the substitute bill.

I urge my colleagues to support the Young-Darden substitute as the most sensitive and responsible solution to instances of polygraph abuse.

□ 1810

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the substitute.

Mr. Chairman, I will make my remarks very brief. I have listened to the arguments on both sides, and both sides have made very valid points.

However, I would like to briefly digress and talk about my experiences with the polygraph starting back in 1963, when I entered law enforcement as a rookie police officer trying to obtain a college degree and work during the daytime and go to school at night.

I had to take a polygraph test once as a condition for employment in law enforcement. The examiner that administered the test to me was a very cantankerous gentleman who was in a big hurry that afternoon to hurry up and finish his screening process of all of us young potential rookie cops. He came out and told me after my test that I had failed.

He said, "I asked you one question on this test," and he said, "You lied."

I said, "What was the question? I don't think I lied."

He said, "I asked you a question: Have you ever done anything in your life that, if we found out about it, might be embarrassing to you or this department?"

Of course, I said, "No." I never stole anything. I never did anything that I thought was real terrible. But I guess in my subconscious, I remembered I borrowed a marble when I was 5 years old, and didn't return it.

He said, "That's what it was. You stole a marble when you were 5 years old, so you flunked. You are not going to get the job as a State trooper."

I said, "That is absolutely ridiculous. I want to see the next person in charge." I went to see the next superior officer, and he said it was ridiculous.

The point I am making is the polygraph is only as good as the examiner and the questions and the way they are predicated. I have no problems with some of the exemptions in this bill. I voted for the bill to allow the Defense Department to give polygraphs. It is a very useful investigative tool.

My fear is that we are going to put the congressional stamp of approval on polygraphing every person who applies for a job in any business in this country as a precondition to employment. I think we have a responsibility to the workers in the country, as well as to our businesses and to our Government. For that reason, I oppose the substitute and I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the substitute, which is a good-faith attempt and has been well presented by its sponsors and cosponsors.

The chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California, mentioned that we have a Congressional Budget Office estimate that this substitute would cost the Federal Government $1 to $2 million in administrative costs. Let me read to you from the Congressional Budget Office letter:

The bill would increase the workload of the Department of Labor, and so result in increased costs for that agency. H.R. 3916 requires all persons conducting polygraph examinations to be certified by the Secretary of Labor, and requires the Secretary to make continuing evaluations of certifications. Should a certification be withdrawn, appeals may be brought in the District Court. In lieu of this process, the Secretary is responsible for certifying administrative plans of state and local governments. In addition to these duties, the Secretary must issue rules and regulations necessary to implement the act, make necessary inspections and investigations, prepare and print notices to be posted upon the premises of every employer involved in interstate commerce, and approve training and continuing education classes necessary for examiners to receive and maintain certification.

Based on information from several states that license polygraph examiners, we estimate that the additional costs to the federal government as a result of this bill would be between $1 million and $2 million annually.

The question is, does the Congress of the United States want to spend another $2 million to encourage the use of lie detector gadgets in this country?

That is what this bill will do, because we have found that every State that has passed regulations over lie detectors has ended up with an explosion of use, because people have become snookered into believing that the lie detector works because the stamp of approval of the Government has been put on it.

As a side matter, one of the other gentlemen in the debate mentioned two recent spies, both tragic cases, but let me bring them up again, the cases of Mr. Walker and Mr. Chin. They were apparently, and convicted of being, spies against this country.

What the proponents of this substitute, which I oppose, did not tell you was that Mr. Walker and Mr. Chin took and passed the lie detector test that was given to them. What they also did not tell you is Mr. Walker used to be a lie detector examiner. He used to give the tests.

Finally, we need to look at this, and we need to look at it in a dispassionate manner: Do these things work? Are they reliable?

A polygraph instrument cannot detect truth or deceit. It can detect increases in blood pressure. It can detect increase respiration. It can detect increased perspiration. But it cannot detect lies. It cannot find the truth. It detects something, but it does not detect lies because there is no uniform physiological response for all liars. That is primarily why this gadget does not work.

The human is a complex instrument. It is a system of thought processes and behavioral processes and intellectual processes, all woven together in a way that man does not understand.

The lie detector people would tell you that that gadget is able to pierce that human intellect and discover what is going on inside of it, whether the brain is lying or telling the truth. People are not psychologically transparent.

Business has been snookered by the lie detector industry. Business is getting the business from the polygraph industry. The lie detector assumes that Pinochhio is not a myth, that when we lie you can see it. Our nose will grow. We will sweat a certain amount more. Our respiration will rise. The lie detector gadget, my friends, does not work.

Perhaps America would be better off if it did, but it does not.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to oppose the substitute.

□ 1820

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 1524 and to close the debate for the proponents of the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG] is recognized for 5 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleagues for the generosity of their time this afternoon. I just want to respond to a couple of points, as those of us who support the substitute close the debate.

The chairman of the committee presenting the bill makes the point that CBO has said our substitute will cost from $1 to $2 million to administer. That is nothing compared to the administrative cost of most bills that this House considers. But when you compare it to the nearly $40 billion a year that our Nation's businesses are losing from internal theft and that we are trying to prevent by a professional approach to the polygraph, the $1 to $2 million is a great investment.

The gentleman also suggested that this machine is not any good and that it cannot determine the truth. He says all it does is measure temperature and perspiration and heart rate. If that is the case, why is he willing to make it available for certain segments of our Government and, certain segments of our private industry, but not others. I find something very, very inconsistent in that argument. If it is good for one industry, it is good for another. I think that argument is very, very flawed and very, very inconsistent.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DARDEN], to close the debate on this amendment.

Mr. DARDEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I want to join my colleague in expressing my clear surprise at the sponsor of the bill and the distinguished chairman of the committee who complains about spending $1 million to save $50 billion, $50 billion which is stolen from the businessmen of America by dishonest employees.

I think we can spend and ought to spend $1 million or $2 million or $10 million to assure that we do not continue to permit this type of theft because, Mr. Chairman, here is what happens when we have $50 billion stolen from the private sector: The cost goes up.

Who ends up paying for it? The taxpayer, the consumer.

Mr. Chairman, it is estimated that, as a result of employee theft in this country, the cost of goods at retail is 10 to 15 percent more than what it would be did not employee dishonesty occur.

So I think $1 million is a small price to pay, Mr. Chairman, in return for taking all precautions that we can take against dishonest employees.

I would also point out, Mr. Chairman, that in this day of a litigation-conscious society, employers are constantly being sued and brought to court and being held accountable for not properly screening, not properly seeing that the persons they hire have matters in their backgrounds which are objectionable; for example, the repairman who might rape a customer, or something, while making a service call.

So, in many instances, we are being asked and employers are being held more and more accountable to the general public for a closer scrutiny of their employees.

But let me finally say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, that the substitute ought to pass, and the reason it ought to be is that we should not have one standard for the private sector and another standard for the public sector. It is time to put this hypocrisy to rest.

And remember that on the motion of my colleague from Florida, in June 1985 this House approved polygraph use by the Department of Defense, by a vote of 333 to 71.

H.R. 1524 would take away from private industry an investigative tool which the Congress has deemed appropriate and necessary for use by the Federal Government. If it is good enough for the Federal Government, it is good enough for the businessmen of America.

I urge the adoption of the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that he was in doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate section 2.

The text of section 2 is as follows:

SEC. 2. PROHIBITIONS OF LIE DETECTOR USE.

It shall be unlawful for any employer engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce—

(1) directly or indirectly, to require, request, suggest, or cause any employee or prospective employee to take or submit to any lie detector test;

(2) to use, accept, refer to, or inquire concerning the results of any lie detector test of any empoyee or prospective employee;

(3) to discharge, dismiss, discipline in any manner, or deny employment or promotion to, or threaten to take any such action against—

(A) any employee or prospective employee who refuses, declines, or fails to take or submit to any lie detector test; or

(B) any employee or prospective employee on the basis of the results of any lie detector test; or

(4) to discharge or in any manner discriminate against an employee or prospective employee because—

(A) such employee or prospective employee has filed any complaint or instituted or caused to be instituted any proceeding under or related to this Act;

(B) such employee or prospective employee has testified or is about to testify in any such proceeding; or

(C) of the exercise by such employee, on behalf of himself or others, of any right afforded by this Act.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the bill be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

The text of the remainder of the bill, beginning with section 3, is as follows:

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WILLIAMS

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS: Page 6, beginning on line 20, strike out all of subsection (b) through page 7, line 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) NATIONAL DEFENSE AND SECURITY EXEMPTION.—(1) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prohibit the administration, in the performance of any counterintelligence function, of any lie detector test to—

(A) any expert or consultant under contract to the Department of Defense or any employee of any contractor of such department; or

(B) any expert or consultant under contract with the Department of Energy in connection with the atomic energy defense activities of such department or any employee of any contractor of such department in connection with such activities.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prohibit the administration, in the performance of any intelligence or counterintelligence function, of any lie detector test to—

(A)(i) any individual employed by, or assigned or detailed to, the National Security Agency or the Central Intelligence Agency, (ii) any expert or consultant under contract to the National Security Agency or the Central Intelligence Agency, (iii) any employee of a contractor of the National Security Agency or the Central Intelligence Agency, or (iv) any individual applying for a position in the National Security Agency or the Central Intelligence Agency; or

(B) any individual assigned to a space where sensitive cryptographic information is produced, processed, or stored for the National Security Agency or the Central Intelligence Agency.

Mr. WILLIAMS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering today has been reviewed by the other side. I understand there are no objections. It has been developed in discussions with the Department of Defense, the Department of Energy, and the Central Intelligence Agency and has their full support.

I am including in the RECORD letters from them to Chairman HAWKINS for the RECORD confirming their support. The amendment has been reviewed and agreed to by the Armed Services Committee of the House as well as by my friends in minority.

The letters are as follows:

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, DC., December 11, 1985.

In reply refer to: I-18837/85.

Hon. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to your letter of December 4, 1985 in which you offer amendment language to House Resolution 1524.

We do indeed support the language of the amendment and interpose no objection to the Bill so long as agencies of the Federal government and persons contracting with the government are exempt from its provisions.

Sincerely,

FRED C. IKLE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, DC., December 12, 1985.

Hon. PAT WILLIAMS,
House of Representatives, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR PAT: I understand that H.R. 1524, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act of 1985, will soon be considered by the House.

This is to advise you that the Committee on Armed Services is supportive of the amendment you propose to offer to section 6(b) of the bill. That amendment would exempt consultants or employees of contractors of the Department of Defense from the provisions of the bill. We believe it is necessary that the bill provide a specific exemption for employees of contractors of the Department of Defense and for consultants of the department.

Sincerely,

LES ASPIN, Chairman.

CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, December 11, 1985.

Hon. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am pleased to respond on behalf of the Central Intelligence Agency to your letter of December 4, 1985 concerning H.R. 1524.

The Agency's concern with this legislation has been the sufficiency of the exemption for employees of Agency contractors. We have reviewed the "Amendment in the Nature of a Substitute to Section 6(b) in H.R. 1524" which was enclosed with your letter. Assuming that this amendment were to be adopted, the Agency's concern would be alleviated and the Agency would have no objection to this legislation. Other agencies, however, may seek amendments to the exemption provisions to insure that polygraph examinations are not precluded for contractors and consultants employed by the Federal Government and having access to classified information.

Thank you for the opportunity to comment on this legislation.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

CHARLES A. BRIGGS,
Director, Office of Legislative Liaison.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is technical in nature. It simply consolidates language relating to the decision of the House earlier a few months ago to grant the use of lie detectors to some agencies of the Federal Government.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to support the gentleman's amendment. We have read it and this side supports the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WILLIAMS

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS: Page 2, line 5, strike out "of 1985".

Page 3, line 14, strike out "bais" and insert in lieu thereof "basis".

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is very technical in nature, simply changing the date to make it conform with this year and also correcting a typographical error, a misspelling.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and just to say that the minority has reviewed the amendment and has no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. JEFFORDS

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JEFFORDS: Page 9, strike out lines 8 through 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 8. EFFECTIVE DATE.

This Act shall take effect 6 months after the date of the enactment of this Act.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely makes the effective date 6 months after enactment instead of upon enactment, to give the industry time to adjust to the new law and allow the Secretary of Labor to promulgate such notices as he may deem appropriate.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, the committee has reviewed the amendment and has no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ECKART OF OHIO

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ECKART of Ohio: Page 8, strike out lines 1 through 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(d) EXEMPTION FOR DRUG SECURITY, DRUG THEFT, OR DRUG DIVERSION INVESTIGATIONS.—This Act shall not prohibit the use of a lie detector test by any employer authorized to manufacture, distribute, or dispense a controlled substance listed in schedule I, II, III, or IV pursuant to section 202 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 812) to the extent that—

(1) such use is consistent with—

(A) applicable State and local law, and

(B) any negotiated collective bargaining agreement, that explicitly or implicitly limits or prohibits the use of lie detector tests by any such employer;

(2) the test is administered only to an employee who has, or prospective employee who would have, direct access to any such controlled substance; and

(3) the results of an analysis of lie detector charts are not used as the sole basis upon which any employee or prospective employee is discharged, dismissed, disciplined in any manner, or denied employment or promotion.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

□ 1900

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, when this legislation came before the Education and Labor Committee last fall, I was successful in including language which provides a specific exemption for the pharmaceutical industry with respect to its handling of controlled substances. My committee amendment allows those employers in the industry to polygraph employees who have direct access to controlled substances as part of a broader investigation into a theft or diversion of such drugs.

The amendment I am offering today would alter the committee-approved language in two ways: No. 1, the exemption would be slightly expanded to allow for the preemployment screening of prospective employees who would have direct access to these substances during the course of their employment, No. 2, the amendment explicitly prohibits that the results of the test be used as the sole basis for hiring or firing an employee.

During consideration of my amendment in committee, concern was expressed that by only allowing the testing of employees during an investigation, rather than before he or she is hired, is synonymous with closing the barn door after the horse has escaped. While I have serious reservations regarding the accuracy of this instrument, reservations that are supported by a number of studies which question the scientific validity of the polygraph, I am offering this exemption because of my concerns with the epidemic of drug abuse in this Nation.

Yet, because of the questionable accuracy of the lie detector, especially with regard to preemployment testing, my amendment protects employees by requiring that the evidence from the test must be supported by additional information before punitive action can be taken against that employee or prospective employee.

Mr. Chairman, I urge support for my amendment. The full committee, in approving my earlier language, agreed with my premise that we must extend every legal tool available to the pharmaceutical industry to assist in combating the theft of dangerous drugs. I firmly believe that it is in our interest to do all that we can to halt the illlegal trafficking and selling of drugs. I hope that my colleagues will support this amendment.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ARMEY TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ECKART OF OHIO

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ARMEY to the amendment offered by Mr. ECKART of Ohio: Page 1, strike out lines 14 through 16 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(2) the test is administered only to an employee who has, or prospective employees who would have, access to the manufacture, storage, distribution, or sale of any such controlled substance; and

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment somewhat reluctantly because I do support the thrust of the Eckart amendment.

When this bill was before our full committee, I offered an amendment to exempt the drug industry from the demand for polygraphs, and my amendment was amended by the gentleman from Ohio to limit preemployment testing and to limit testing to those employees who have direct access to controlled substances.

Given the nature and extent of our drug problem and the lengths that some will go to obtain drugs, I felt this was unwise. This particular exemption for the drug industry was adopted by the committee, and I am very pleased that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART] proposes now to add that preemployment testing. I am concerned, however, with the limitation on testing for those who have only "direct access to controlled substances."

It is not hard to imagine a number of scenarios whereby employees who are far removed from the direct handling of drugs can be very directly involved in stealing them. This, Mr. Chairman, is what my amendment addresses. It is not difficult, for example, to understand the extent to which people will go, the lengths they will go to obtain these drugs illegally and then, of course, to move them on the street and access them to our youngsters.

Obviously, business already does a good deal to create procedures for handling of the drugs that would give us some sense of security, and anybody who would try to bypass these procedures would find themselves with some difficulty, especially when you realize that the recording of the transactions and the recording of the manifests are kept separate from that person who actually physically moves the drugs. It turns out in all too many cases that if an individual is driving the truck, for example, and wishes to move the drugs or remove them, that they would be faced with the fact that there is a paper trail, a record on the movement of these drugs, and for him to be able to get away with that, it would be necessary to have that record altered. We have documented cases where the theft was only made possible by the fact that the individual was able to conspire with somebody, perhaps a computer operator or a billing clerk that was able at the same time the drugs were removed to alter the record. So indeed they could not be traced through this paper trail.

The long and the short of my amendment is that we have got to be able to use this instrument of investigation to detect the entire trail of these drugs, and to be able to have some assurance that we can investigate at any juncture where, indeed, an infraction of the security of the drugs may take place and become available to our youngsters in the future.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARMEY. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. I have two short questions if my friend would. We list the schedules, I, II, III, and IV. There are similar schedules. When the gentleman uses the word "controlled substances," I assume he refers to the section 202 common list of controlled substances?

Mr. ARMEY. Yes, I do.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. The second question I would have would focus on the word "access." My concern would be the cashier, the clerk, someone who would not be in the manufacture, storage, distribution. Can we get some agreement to insert the word "direct" before the word "access," to try to narrow the focus?

Mr. ARMEY. I share the gentleman's concern and he is absolutely right about somebody employed in the business that has no access whatsoever. I am concerned about the record-keeping, and the gentleman understands that problem.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. If the gentleman would put the word "direct" in there, then I will be happy to accept the amendment.

Mr. ARMEY. I see the gentleman's point, given the manufacture, storage, and distribution, and then we would have covered all of the bases that we feel need to be, without spilling over into areas that are not in need.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. If the gentleman would ask unanimous consent to include that word, we would be happy to accept the amendment under the circumstances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARMEY. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, in the instance of a computer operator who is filling in the location and the amounts of these code A drugs, is that computer operator considered to have direct access to those drugs under the gentleman's amendment?

□ 1910

Mr. ARMEY. Well, I would consider that a direct portion of the distribution process. In other words, if you talk to people in this industry who, of course, feel this responsibility of moving these, one of the components of their plan for security is to keep that paper trail so that we can know, in effect, who they are checked out to and what inventory was left, which location and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(On request of Mr. ECKART of Ohio, and by unanimous consent, Mr. ARMEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ARMEY. I would be concerned that anybody who would be able to have the responsibility to keep the record of the movement of these materials, whether they are entering the record or perhaps on the other end, would have an opportunity to alter that record and thereby cover the, more or less cover the tracks of the person who physically removed them.

I share the concern of the gentleman from Ohio. We do not want this to spill over to janitors or other people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will yield, do I understand that the gentleman has willingly accepted the word "direct" to be placed before the word "access" in his amendment?

Mr. ARMEY. I believe if we put the word "direct" in there, given our understanding of what we mean by distribution; I expect perhaps to hear some legislative record of that understanding, we would probably all find ourselves quite satisfied.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will yield, I would say to the subcommittee chairman and to my friend from Ohio, that the sponsor of the legislation would accept the amendment.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous-consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY] be modified after the word "have," and after the comma to insert the word "direct".

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The text of the amendment, as modified, is as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ARMEY to the amendment offered by Mr. ECKART of Ohio: Page 1, strike out lines 14 through 16 and insert in lieu thereof:

(2) the test is administered only to an employee who has, or prospective employees who would have, direct access to the manufacture, storage, distribution, or sale of any such controlled substances; and

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, we are delighted to accept the modification, and appreciate the gentleman's expression of concern on this question.

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY], as modified, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART].

The amendment, as modified, to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART], as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. ROUKEMA

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. ROUKEMA: Page 8, after line 15, insert the following new subsection:

(e) EXEMPTION FOR SECURITY SERVICES.—(1) Subject to paragraph (3), this Act shall not prohibit the use of a lie detector test by a private employer whose primary business purpose consists of providing armored car personnel, personnel engaged in the design, installation, and maintenance of security alarm systems, or other uniformed or plainclothes security personnel and whose function includes protection of—

(A) facilities, materials, or operations having a significant impact on the health or safety of any State or political subdivision therof, or the national security of the United States, as determined under rules and regulations issued by the Secretary within 60 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, including—

(i) facilities engaged in the production, transmission, or distribution of electric or nuclear power;

(ii) public water supply facilities;

(iii) shipments or storage of radioactive or other toxic waste materials; and

(iv) public transportation; or

(B) currency, negotiable securities, precious commodities or instruments, or proprietary information.

(2) The exemption provided under paragraph (1) shall not diminish an employer's obligation to comply with—

(A) applicable State and local law, and

(B) any negotiated collective bargaining agreement, which limit or prohibit the use of lie detector tests on such employees.

(3) The exemption provided under this subsection shall not apply if—

(A) the results of an analysis of lie detector charts are used as the sole basis upon which an employee or prospective employee is discharged, dismissed, disciplined in any manner, or denied employment or promotion; or

(B) the test is administered to an employee or prospective employee who is not or would not be employed to protect facilities, materials, operations, or assets referred to in paragraph (1).

Mrs. ROUKEMA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I join Congressman BIAGGI in offering an amendment which would exempt from the bill's coverage firms whose primary business is to furnish protective security services when they are engaged in the protection of sensitive facilities and valuable items and documents. The Roukema-Biaggi amendment includes armored car, uniformed and plainclothes guards, and security alarm companies. It would allow polygraphs to be administered for the protection of such facilities as nuclear powerplants, public water supply, and public transportation.

First, I would like to commend my colleague on the Education and Labor Committee, Mr. BIAGGI, a cosponsor of H.R. 1524, who recognized the need for this exemption during the committee's deliberations. The gentleman from New York has played a crucial role in the development of this amendment and I am pleased to have him join me in offering it.

In addition, I appreciate the cooperative spirit of the sponsor of H.R. 1524, Mr. WILLIAMS, who recognizes the need for flexibility in the protective security area. Despite our philosophical differences over the need for H.R. 1524, it is indeed reassuring that we have been able to cast aside those differences to fashion an amendment which allows flexibility while still containing necessary safeguards for the employees.

Even if you believe there is a need for this bill's prohibitions, you must realize that there are certain interests which are so sensitive to both the employer and the society at large that we must provide some additional leeway to that employer. The bill already recognizes a need to accommodate certain sensitive concerns by exempting governmental employees and contractors to the CIA, FBI, and the National Security Agency. But our national security goes well beyond the operations of the Federal Government and is affected by strictly private-sector functions such as the transportation of currency and the operation of certain facilities, such as airports. The threat of terrorism alone warrants our permitting additional flexibility in establishing security measures in these areas.

The need for my amendment is underscored by a recent survey showing that 65 percent of the total losses in the armored car industry are a result of internal theft. To give an idea of what this means in dollars, that industry transports, counts, and stores over $15 billion a day. In addition, employees in the protective security industry frequently are required to carry guns, which is almost always the case with armored car drivers. As custodians of a customer's money and protector of his interests, the industry has an obligation to do everything in its power to attempt to recruit and hire employees whose honesty and integrity is beyond question.

The vulnerability of the security industry was illustrated by an incident which recently occurred in Connecticut, where preemployment polygraphing is outlawed. The FBI arrested members of the Puerto Rican terrorist organization—the Macheros—and charged them with an $8 million robbery by planting a member of their group as a Wells Fargo armored car driver. The money has since been traced to Cuba where it is now beyond recovery.

Since the guard in this case had no prior criminal record, the only way of detecting his motives for applying would have been through the use of the polygraph. Indeed, as was learned from testimony received from a representative of the industry, applicants with illegitimate motives are usually deterred from even applying by the mere existence of the polygraph.

As I have mentioned, the bill itself recognizes that there can be instances where the use of polygraphs is appropriate. Indeed, the House as a whole recognized this necessity when it overwhelmingly—333 to 71—adopted an amendment to the defense authorization bill requiring the use of polygraphs for counterintelligence purposes.

My amendment simply expands upon this by recognizing that, regardless of any doubts one has regarding the use of polygraphs, there are certain situations where life and property are so extremely vulnerable that we must permit companies to take reasonable precautions. When these situations include such activities as the guarding of nuclear facilities and the transporting of millions of dollars, the utmost caution is essential.

To address concerns that the exemption would be so broad as to cover low-priority security functions, my amendment contains an important limitation. It only allows polygraphs to be administered to employees engaged in the protection of currency, negotiable securities, precious commodities or instruments, proprietary information, or facilities, materials, or operations having a significant impact on our national security or the health or safety of a State or locality. The definition of such facilities would be provided by the Secretary of Labor through regulations issued within 60 days after enactment.

In further defining these interests through regulations, I emphasize that the language in the amendment is designed to be inclusive and broadly construed. Therefore, we do not expect the Secretary in his regulations to limit the exemption to just those facilities listed in the amendment. In addition the definition of "proprietary information" shall include documents which are essential for the functioning of a business.

Finally, my amendment contains a necessary safeguard to ensure that innocent individuals are not injured through the use of a polygraph. It would prohibit exempted employers from denying employment, firing, or taking any other employment action solely on the basis of the results of the polygraph. In the committee's hearings we received testimony from the protective security industry and others indicating that this is the standard practice for employers who use polygraphs in a responsible manner.

We must not forget that, ultimately, it is the average citizen who relies on the dependability and integrity of the protective security industry. Let's make sure they have the resources to live up to those expectations.

Mr. Chairman, this is a common sense approach to the use of the polygraph.

Mr. HILER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HILER. I would ask the gentlewoman, her amendment seems reasonable, but I wonder is the polygraph more accurate when it deals with Brinks car operators than it is when it deals with people in manufacturing or people that are tellers in banks?

Mrs. ROUKEMA. No. I would agree with the point that the gentleman is making, and indeed I have opposed this legislation for precisely that reason.

However, it is important to understand that this amendment is an improvement and it also makes the point that there are reasonable exceptions.

Mr. HILER. Yes.

If the gentlewoman will yield further, I am astonished that the authors of this bill are accepting exemptions. If a polygraph does not work for manufacturing enterprises in the United States, I am not sure why it works for national security or why it works for guarding nuclear facilities or anything else. I am just bewildered that the authors of the bill are accepting all these amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding, and inasmuch as the gentleman has in effect asked a question of the author of the legislation and I am the author, let me say that the reason we are willing to accept this amendment is because it is very necessary, in the judgment of the sponsor of the amendment as it is to the sponsor of the legislation, to establish symmetry between what we allow in the public sector in the way of polygraphing and what we allow in the private sector.

The gentlewoman is correct. Security guards who guard our nuclear powerplants, our hydroelectric facilities, our huge shipments of code A drugs, our negotiable securities are guarding the health and safety of America, and we allow them to be polygraphed.

We think that establishes some symmetry with what the FBI, the CIA, and the National Security Agency are allowed to do.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud to join the gentlelady from New Jersey who has worked diligently with me in developing this language in offering this amendment. Simply put, it recognizes the highly sensitive nature of the security industry and provides certain segments of this industry with the responsible and necessary use of the polygraph, while providing a number of carefully crafted and very important labor protections.

The Roukema-Biaggi amendment would allow a private employer to use the polygraph for prehiring and posthiring purposes, but only in those cases where employees would be responsible for high priority security functions, such as protecting public utilities, hazardous materials shipments, public transportation, currency, negotiable securities, precious commodities, or proprietary information.

Further, the amendment specifically states that the exemption provided for the security industry "shall not diminish an employer's obligation to comply with applicable State and local law, and any negotiated collective-bargaining agreement, which limit or prohibit the use of lie detector tests on such employees."

Finally, the amendment would guarantee that the "analysis of lie detector charts" are not used as the sole basis for discharging, dismissing, disciplining, or denying employment or promotion. The Department of Labor would be required to ensure that these provisions are effectively enforced and that the rights of the employee under these provisions are fully protected.

Mr. Chairman, as a 23-year veteran of law enforcement, I believe there are certain very specific situations where the polygraph can and should be used to help prevent crimes, and to detect criminals once a crime has been committed. This is one of those times. After all, the private security industry provides security for nuclear power facilities, the Federal Reserve, the strategic petroleum reserve, commercial and industrial firms, the U.S. Postal Service, the banking industry, hospitals and airports, to name just some of their responsibilities.

Certainly, a crime at any of these facilities could have devastating consequences. That is why they deserve the same special consideration being given by this bill to Government employers and private contractors dealing with intelligence or counterintelligence with the CIA, NSA, Department of Defense, and the FBI.

One final note, Mr. Chairman. History tells us that the polygraph test is neither overused nor abused by the private security services industry. The test, itself, costs hundreds of dollars to administer responsibly and is used on a very selective basis. For example, the industry's largest firm, which employs some 55,000 security personnel, has testified before our committee that in 1984 they gave only 700 preemployment polygraph tests, 150 tests related to missing funds and 50 random tests to those employees in highly sensitive areas. Further, they stated that in no case is a person denied employment or dismissed solely on the results of a polygraph examination.

Mr. Chairman, for anyone here interested in fighting crime, this is a good amendment. For anyone here interested in protecting the rights of labor, this is a good amendment. And, for anyone here interested in protecting the security interests of our Nation, this is a good amendment. I strongly urge its approval.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA].

The amendment was agreed to:

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ECKART OF OHIO

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ECKART of Ohio: Page 8, after line 15, insert the following new section (and redesignate the succeeding sections accordingly):

SEC. 7. DISCLOSURE TO EXAMINED EMPLOYEE OR PROSPECTIVE EMPLOYEE.

It shall be unlawful for any person who administers a lie detector test on behalf of any employer (other than an employer described in section 6(a), 6(b), or 6(c)) to fail to provide to the individual examined, within a reasonable time upon the request of that individual, a copy of written reports, recommendations, and charts which are prepared for, or made available to, such employer on the basis of the results of such test.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am offering an amendment which would require that the employee or prospective employee who has been polygraphed under the exemptions provided in this bill, have the right to obtain copies of the test results as well as any written reports or recommendations based on the results of that exam.

I am offering this amendment in order to provide protection to the employees who may be required to submit to a polygraph exam. The scientific accuracy of these instruments have never been proven. As a result, I think it is vital that we provide every employee with the recourse to examine their test responses and determine whether they have been wrongfully accused of lying during the course of their polygraph examination.

I don't believe that my colleagues should have a problem with this amendment. My colleagues from Georgia and Florida, who have introduced legislation to require the licensing of polygraph examiners, provided a similar protection in their bill.

The exemptions we have accepted today, though limited in scope, still provide a congressional approval of polygraphing in some cases. I do not believe that the adoption of these amendments signify congressional approval of the polygraph as an instrument for all employment testing, but rather a realization that there are some very specific cases, such as when our Nation's security is at stake, to allow the industry to use this tool as part of preemployment screening or an investigation.

Because we allow these limited exemptions, but still do not have full faith that the polygraph is properly registering the responses of the examinee, it is important that we provide examinees with the ability to obtain copies of materials which have been presented to their employer or prospective employer.

I urge my colleagues to adopt this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BROOMFIELD

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROOMFIELD: Page 8, after line 15, insert the following new subsection:

(e) PUBLIC UTILITIES EXEMPTION.—(1) Subject to paragraph (3), this Act shall not apply with respect to—

(A) an employee or prospective employee of a public utility engaged in the production, distribution, or transmission of electric energy; or

(B) an employee of a contractor with any such utility.

(2) The exemption provided under paragraph (1) shall not diminish an employer's obligation to comply with—

(A) applicable State and local law, and

(B) any negotiated collective bargaining agreement, which limit or prohibit the use of lie detector tests on such employees.

(3) The exemption provided under this subsection shall not apply if—

(A) the results of an analysis of lie detector charts are used as the sole basis upon which an employee or prospective employee is discharged, dismissed, disciplined in any manner, or denied employment or promotion; or

(B) the test is administered to an employee or prospective employee who does not or would not have direct access to computers, generators, power lines, or other facilities or equipment related to the production, transmission, or distribution of electric energy.

Mr. BROOMFIELD (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOMFIELD Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering would extend the national security exemption, already in this bill, by allowing our vital electric utilities to continue polygraph testing of certain employees, prospective employees, and employees of contractors who have or would have direct access to the computers, generators, powerlines, or other facilities or equipment related to the production, transmission, or distribution of electric energy.

It is a narrowly drawn amendment that has been developed with the cooperation of Congressman WILLIAMS and his staff, as well as the various investor-owned utility associations. Their contributions to this amendment have been enormous and I wish to express my appreciation for their help.

We are all aware of the important role that electric power—whether it is generated from nuclear powerplants or from other sources—plays in the well-being of the American people and in our national security. Because of this important role it is critical that we maintain a reliable supply to the Nation.

However, all of us are aware of the ugly specter of terrorism in the world today, and our utility companies and this Nation, unfortunately, are not invulnerable to them. Our power supply depends upon interconnected networks covering vast geographic areas. An act of sabotage or terrorism in one major generating facility or switching station could cause power outages in several States. Further, many of our power companies also own and operate nuclear powerplants which must also be protected. These plants, according to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, have already been the targets of more than a dozen deliberate acts of damage between 1980 and 1982.

Mr. Chairman, the electric utilities exercise great caution and care in selecting employees for these sensitive facilities, and the polygraph and similar methods serve as one of the tools they utilize in their checks.

I urge my colleagues to allow them to continue to use this tool to protect their operations and us by accepting my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I yield to the author of the bill, the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the gentleman from Michigan for yielding to me. Speaking as the author of the bill, as a sponsor of the bill, we are glad to accept this amendment because again it extends the exemption to power-generating resources. It is in the best interests of the security of this country that we protect large hydroelectric plants and nuclear powerplants from sabotage. That is what the gentleman is trying to accomplish. I note that the gentleman's amendment has the endorsement of the Edison Electric Institute, the Association of Investor-owned Electric Utilities, and the American Nuclear Energy Council. I am glad to join them and the gentleman in supporting his amendment.

EDISON ELECTRIC INSTITUTE,
Washington, DC, March 11, 1986.

Hon. PAT WILLIAMS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR PAT: The Polygraph Protection Act (H.R. 1524) is scheduled for House consideration on Wednesday, March 12. The purpose of the legislation is to limit the use of lie detector and similar tests by employers engaged in interstate commerce.

In a previous letter, I outlined the national security reasons why the electric utility industry must retain the option of using such tests. Congressman William S. Broomfield will offer an amendment to accomplish this purpose. The amendment exempting electric utilities is drafted narrowly, and applies only to employees of electric utilities engaged in the production, transmission, or distribution of electric power. The amendment has the support of Congressman Pat Williams, the primary sponsor of H.R. 1524.

With the inclusion of the amendment exempting electric utilities, the Edison Electric Institute supports H.R. 1524.

Sincerely,

THOMAS R. KUHN.

AMERICAN NUCLEAR ENERGY COUNCIL,
Washington, DC, March 11, 1986.

Hon. PAT WILLIAMS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WILLIAMS: On behalf of the nuclear utility members of the Council, I am writing to express support for the Broomfield amendment to H.R. 1524, The Polygraph Protection Act of 1985.

This amendment establishes a necessary exemption for electric utilities in order to protect public health and safety as well as national security.

I am pleased to learn that you have agreed to support the Broomfield amendment. As amended by the Broomfield amendment, the Council supports H.R. 1524.

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. DAVIS.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, is this yet another exemption from this bill, this polygraph which is such a dangerous, dastardly piece of equipment? Do we have yet another exemption?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment speaks for itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MCCOLLUM

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCCOLLUM: Page 8, after line 15, insert the following new subsection:

(e) FINANCIAL INSTITUTION EXEMPTION.—(1) This Act shall not prohibit the use of a lie detector test on any officer or employee or prospective officer or prospective employee of any financial institution (as defined in section 5312(a)(2) of title 31, United States Code).

(2) This subsection shall not preempt any State or local law which prohibits or restricts the use of lie detector tests.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is very simple. It exempts all financial institutions from this act. It exempts banks, credit unions, it exempts savings and loans, it exempts securities dealers, it exempts anybody who is defined as a financial institution under our laws. We have already listed a number of exemptions to the Polygraph Act tonight.

We just a few moments ago passed an exemption for armored cars and drivers of armored cars that carry the cash around town for our banks. But we have not exempted the banks. It does not make any sense to me not to exempt the banks if we are going to exempt the armored-car drivers. The fact of the matter is we have exempted some drug people too, exempted the pharmaceutical companies, but we have not exempted the banks and the banks who are the employers of the tellers who are the ones in the front line to guard us against the money launderers who take the drug money from drug offenses.

It seems to me if we are going to have a logical bill in this case that if we have done the exemptions we just did for the pharmaceutical companies, for the armored-car drivers, for the security guards, we ought to exempt the banks and financial institutions.

Now why, beyond the fact that they fall into a similar category, do we exempt them? In the first place financial institutions operate with other people's money on the basis of trust. While most financial institutions have regulations covering actions that they may take in commerce with depositors' money there are no regulations that cover the conduct and integrity of prospective employees. For banks, over 80 percent of losses occur from internal theft. In 1983 financial losses to banks from internal theft amounted to over $282 million. In 1984 that increased to over $382 million, and that is while they were using polygraph tests to try to screen prospective employees. That is not just some of the banks' money we are talking about that is being lost here, these millions of dollars; that is money from somebody's checking account, that is somebody's life savings we are talking about. While many of those losses are insured, the costs of those thefts occur to all depositors and not all losses are insured.

Second, let us look at the fact that banks deal in large amounts of cash. That is why we are covering armored-car drivers in the first place. Cash is important, we ought to be concerned about that.

My colleagues, I think this is an important amendment. It is very important because we are dealing with financial institutions, banks, people's money, we are dealing with whether or not we are going to be able to have a lie-detector test to give them one more tool to screen employees just as we have allowed the lie-detector test to be used for certain industries like pharmaceuticals, armored cars, and security guards.

Money disappears in banks all the time. It disappears because people steal it, those who are working for the banks. That is where the problem is. That is why we need a check on them.

The fact of the matter is that not only do people steal cash from banks, they steal securities. Not only that, but the biggest single way you steal money today in the financial world is with a computer, just being an employee who has access to press a botton at one of these institutions to transfer money from one account to another or overseas or wherever. And almost anybody who has access as an employee of a bank has access to these computers to play games with whether it is in the middle of the night or otherwise.

I submit to you that at the forefront of those institutions in this country in the private world that need the little protection that public policy allows, we have these financial institutions and we need an exemption for them for that reason.

But it is not just a question of stealing money or pushing a button or doing what else might be done in a normal financial transaction that bothers me. Right now we have millions of dollars, millions of dollars every year that are laundered through our financial institutions by drug dealers looking for a way to cover up the sources of their illegal transactions, looking for a way to come up with money that is clean and looking good. Who do they go to for that? Well, they go to a lot of people but not too unusual to have them go to a local teller in branch X, Y, or Z of bank X. And when they do that and they find a person who is susceptible to corruption, it is very easy to launder that money, in the millions of dollars that we are talking about, to avoid the Bank Secrecy Act, to avoid any law we have now on the books and it will make it that much more difficult when we come out with a bill on the floor this year or later to have a reasonable money laundering crime that can be enforced under those situations.

I submit to my colleagues that above all else tonight if we are going to pass this bill we need an exemption for financial institutions so they can screen the employees that have the trust of the money of this country. We need it desperately and I urge my colleagues that they adopt this amendment that I am offering tonight and we get on with the reasonableness which is in this bill from the standpoint of exemptions. This is another exemption as my colleague from Indiana said. It is a very important exemption, and I urge the passage of the McCollum amendment, please.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise to oppose this amendment.

We have accepted most of the amendments, I guess all of the amendments that have been offered on this bill today. But we cannot accept an amendment to include all of the employees of a financial institution. Let me tell you what that does. The definition of "financial institution" reads this way: All private banks, all commerical banks, all thrift institutions, all credit-card systems, all insurance companies, all pawnbrokers, all loan companies, all telegraph companies, all travel agencies. That is the definition of "financial institutions."

Now if you are for strapping in all the little telegraph operators to the lie-detector gadget, you are for the McCollum amendment. If you are for strapping in all the tellers, you are for the McCollum amendment.

But if you are for that, you cannot possible be for this bill.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, I would be glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. McCOLLUM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

That is one of the fallacies of the bill. I do not think there is any question but that the gentleman has made a good point. But the only way when you start drawing these lines, and that is what that gentleman and others out here are doing today, you draw hard lines. You cannot draw easy lines. Financial institutions by definition do cover all those people. They are involved with passing the money of this country, they are the ones where the traveler's checks are, they are the ones where the bank drafts are, and they are the ones where the computer pushes millions of dollars around. You cannot have a narrow definition of a financial institution and you cannot narrow this thing down any more than that without providing a reasonable exemption for the polygraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reclaiming my time, this is the business of this House to draw lines and with this bill we have drawn the line I think, but we should not allow all the pawnbrokers, telegraph operators, and the little gals sitting in the credit-card companies to undergo lie-detector tests.

□ 1935

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I support the position of the sponsor of the bill and rise in opposition to this particular amendment.

I think we are getting a little bit carried away. I think the Congress is an institution that oversees more money than probably many of these groups we are talking about. Someone is going to come up with an amendment that perhaps maybe every Congressman should be tested whether or not they have any Communist ties. I think we are trying to eradicate the basic measure that is here. And I think we are going to come up with enough exemptions that there will be no intent to the original bill, that I think has the support of the Members of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say that we are starting to deviate. This is not a drug issue, a dollar issue, a crime issue, a Republican issue, a Democrat issue; it is a rights issue. We are starting to get to the point with accepting all these exemptions that we are starting to infringe upon those rights.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to tell my colleagues that we just accepted an amendment that says if you are a guard dealing with currency, negotiable securities, precious commodities, you can be made to undergo this lie detector examination. That is OK; this goes far too far.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to suggest to my friend from Florida that the litany of institutions that are covered under this definition is so extensive that, if I were the gentleman, I would advance my cause to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to make eminent sense to me that if we exempt the people who carry the money away from the financial institutions, should we not exempt the people who collect the money at the financial institutions.

Money comes in many forms today. It comes in plastic cards. In comes in wire transfers. It comes in travelers checks. It comes in greenbacks and it comes in hard currency.

This amendment makes eminent good sense. I think the bill is a bad bill, but if we are going to have the bill, if we are going to have many exemptions already, this exemption clearly is one that ought to be allowed. When we talk about the life savings and the cash flows of businesses and people and corporate America, we ought to be just as concerned about the safety of the institutions that take care of those functions as we are about the institutions that carry the money away.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a point on the gentleman's time, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The author of this legislation just said we covered all of this and we protect your money because we accepted an amendment to cover guards who guard the money. Guards who guard the buildings with pistols in their pockets or carry the money in trucks are not guarding much of our money today. They are protecting some time-honored 1920's bank robbery, protecting the public from that. But most of the money transactions today and the crime with money is done with a computer inside those institutions. The only way you can protect the money of the people of America today is with the McCollum amendment, protecting the rights of the employers in these financial institutions to examine in advance the employees they are going to hire to find out if they have a record of theft in the past, if they have a record that tends to mean they could be blackmailed into going along with a money laundering machine that somebody proposes to them, that tends to show that they would be a likely subject to go ahead and push that computer buttom and embezzle some money or transfer it somewhere.

Even with that, we cannot expect to protect it all, as the figures I gave earlier show. But with the polygraph, at least we will have some degree of protection with what we have today. Strip the polygraph away, the banks and the public have no protection, none, from people who may be hired who have the thought in mind of going out and stealing moneys while they work at the bank.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for taking some time to make this point. The McCollum amendment is absolutely essential for the protection of the public.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to me as I sat and observed the debate that we have moved—and incidentally, I support the gentleman's amendment. I think it makes sense, and I think the points the gentleman makes are accurate. But it is interesting that we are no longer debating the merits of polygraph. Now we are talking about who is important enough to have protection under polygraph, as we should.

As we are debating this, we have shifted now, as the debate should have shifted. The gentleman from Florida has pointed out how important this is that they be included.

On the other hand, we still have not answered the question of where do we draw the line. The author of the legislation said that we have a responsibility to have a fine line. I would submit that fine line is blurred, because of the debate of the opinion of the gentleman from Florida, the gentleman has pointed out how important it is. We are no longer talking about whether or not it is dependable, but who ought to have exemption from the proposed legislation.

The small business people, the mom and pop shops, are the ones who are going to suffer when we end up with this, because they are the only ones left who are going to be excluded.

Mr. Chairman, I would suggest we vote for this amendment and then close the entire piece of legislation.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, if the polygraph can work effectively for security guards, clearly it can work effectively for financial institutions.

Mr. Chairman, I support the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. McCOLLUM].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 60, noes 47.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. YOUNG OF FLORIDA

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. YOUNG of Florida: Page 8, after line 15, insert the following new subsection:

(e) Children's day care center exemption—

(1) This Act shall not prohibit the use of a lie detector test on any employee or prospective employee of any children's day care center.

(2) This subsection shall not preempt any State or local law which prohibits or restricts the use of lie detector tests.

(f) Nursing home exemption—

(1) This Act shall not prohibit the use of a lie detector test on any prospective employee of any nursing home facility.

(2) This subsection shall not preempt any State or local law which prohibits or restricts the use of lie detector tests.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, of the amendments that I have prefiled, this is the only one that I intend to offer.

In view of the fact that the committee has accepted a number of amendments that exempted certain types of industry, I would ask the committee to very seriously consider accepting this amendment to exempt from the prohibition those industries dealing with children and day-care centers and America's senior citizens in nursing homes. These are people who cannot take care of themselves; people who need someone to be their champion.

Let the House of Representatives tonight take care of America's kids and America's senior citizens. I do not have to relate and I am not going to relate some of the terrible, terrible stories that we have read about in recent months about how children and senior Americans have been so terribly affected by some people in whose care they were charged.

This is a good amendment; it is certainly in keeping with the protection of people that the chairman of the committee talked about before. I hope the committee will accept it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I yield to the gentleman.

□ 2010

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand that the gentleman's amendment would allow or if the employer wished require the lie detecting of all teachers who worked with children in day-care centers, the janitor, the secretary, the person that answers the telephone?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. My response is yes, anyone who would have access to those children or anyone that would have access to those senior citizens lying unprotected in a nursing home bed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Yes, I certainly will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would all of the people who worked in a nursing home, that is, the driver of the van, the Meals on Wheels people, the janitor, the custodian that puts up the flag, would all those people have to undergo a lie detector test?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Well, I do not believe that our intent is to go that far, although we did accept an amendment that would exempt those same people if they carried money. Well, I think the protection of a child's life or a child's well-being is much more important than money.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I am considering trying to accept the gentleman's amendment, but I want to know how direct the access with children and senior citizens is. If the gentleman is talking about giving a lie detector test to somebody who does not deal with these people, then I think that it is too broadly drawn.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. No, sir; I would say to the gentleman that is not our intent. It is only our intent to allow polygraph exams for those who deal directly with children or directly with the elderly in nursing homes.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Yes, I am happy to yield.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, let me salute the gentleman on his amendment. When I have been watching the debate and listening to it, I was sorely tempted to offer an amendment along the lines of what the gentleman said. I think it would be highly irresponsible for this Chamber having exempted drivers of Brink's armored cars, having exempted a variety of other people, and not exempt from the application of this law the very people who deal with our children, vulnerable, weak, impressionable children, and the old people the very same way.

I think the gentleman has a very sensible, a very direct and I think an amendment which ought to be adopted.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Well, I certainly appreciate the gentleman's comments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Yes, I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I need to understand the gentleman's intention. Is the gentleman referring to those employees in child care centers and nursing homes that have direct access to the children and the senior citizens?

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. That is my intent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This gentleman will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I know the hour is running late. I would have no objection if in fact the sponsors of this bill, the managers, would decide to take it up tomorrow at an earlier hour, to allow us to deal with it when we are refreshed. It seems to me that we are dealing with a very, very critical subject at this point.

We started with the premise that these polygraph tests are unreliable, unscientific, and endanger the security, well-being, lives and careers of people who are subjected to them. That has been the thrust of the argument on this issue all along.

The reason that this legislation came forward was to try to provide protection for American workers in the work place. Instead, what is beginning to happen by sort of a salami tactic is that we build in exemption after exemption after exemption. By the time we get through, we will have a piece of legislation which in essence authorizes, rather than restricts, the use of polygraph tests. It passes a favorable judgment on polygraphs.

The legislation would now say that it is OK to subject people who work in day-care centers to these tests. Why not for people who work in grammar schools? What is the magic cutoff? Is it kindergarten, first grade, or second grade?

I really do think, Mr. Chairman, that those who want this legislation very, very badly have lost sight of how this bill has been amended. It is no longer the bill it started out to be or was intended to be.

I think the better part of wisdom at this point, rather than to agree to amendments which ultimately turn this legislation inside out, is to recognize that the climate and the tenor in this body is such that you are accomplishing exactly the opposite of what you set out to do.

I hope that this amendment is defeated, and I would hope that the legislation would be withdrawn because it is in fact creating a worse situation than existed before this bill came on the floor. If adopted, it will be used as the justification for the ever-increasing use of polygraph tests, and you can be assured that the Federal Government will not be far behind in insisting that all Federal employees, too, should be subject to these tests. The process which we have engaged in today is a classic example of good intentions having run amok.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

May I engage in a colloquy with the gentleman from Florida.

The concern expressed by my colleague, the gentleman from Montana, concerning direct access and who would be covered, if I may ask the gentleman if after the words that appear, "prospective employee," to insert the phrase in subsection (e)(1) "with direct access to children," and in subsection (f)(1) "with direct access to nursing home residents."

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's modification be included as part of the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please repeat the modification for the Clerk's sake.

Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, after the words "prospective employee" in subsection (e)(1) insert the phrase "with direct access to children," and in subsection (f)(1) after the words "prospective employee" insert the phrase "with direct access to nursing home residents."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG].

The Clerk read as follows:

Modification to the amendment offered by Mr. YOUNG of Florida: In subsection (e)(1) after "prospective employee" insert "with direct access to children" and in subsection (f)(1) after "prospective employee" insert "with direct access to nursing home residents".

The text of the amendment, as modified, is as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. YOUNG of Florida, as modified: Page 8, after line 15, insert the following new subsection:

(e) Children's day care center exemption—

(1) This Act shall not prohibit the use of a lie detector test on any employee or prospective employee with direct access to children of any children's day care center.

(2) This subsection shall not preempt any State or local law which prohibits or restricts the use of lie detector tests.

(f) Nursing home exemption—

(1) This Act shall not prohibit the use of a lie detector test on any prospective employee with direct access to nursing home residents of any nursing home facility.

(2) This subsection shall not preempt any State or local law which prohibits or restricts the use of lie detector tests.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG] as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HUGHES

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUGHES: Page 8, after line 15, insert the following new subsection:

(e) EXEMPTION FOR LEGALIZED GAMING ESTABLISHMENTS.—(1) This Act shall not prohibit the administration of a lie detector test to any employee of a legalized gaming establishment by such an establishment to the extent that—

(A) such use is consistent with—

(i) applicable State and local law, and

(ii) any negotiated collective bargaining agreement,

that limits or prohibits the use of lie detector tests on such employees; and

(B) the test is administered only to employees with responsibility for, and in connection with, assuring compliance with subchapter II of chapter 53 of title 31, United States Code.

(2) For purposes of this subsection the term "legalized gaming establishment" means any establishment operated under a comprehensive State regulatory system regulating casino gaming or gambling.

Mr. HUGHES (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, my amendment provides an exemption for employees of casinos when those employees are involved in handling large amounts of cash or guaranteeing against money laundering through the casinos.

I might say it does not apply to New Jersey because New Jersey law would not permit polygraphs.

It allows polygraphs to be used to determine whether these employees are in fact involved in laundering large amounts of cash, but only where the use of polygraphs is consistent with State law and existing collective bargaining agreements.

It is very narrowly drawn so it only reaches the filing of those financial transactions that the Department of the Treasury uses to determine whether laundering is taking place.

Casinos present a unique problem in that we do not have the same structure as other financial institutions and if in fact we are serious about trying to focus in on money laundering, then you have got to make sure there are not people inside the casino that ashcan those filing requirements, those reports, that in fact the Department of the Treasury sees.

It is focused just to those reporting requirements. No other areas are covered by this particular amendment.

I would hope that this amendment for casinos and the reporting of financial transactions will be accepted by the committee I think it is needed. We are doing a lot of work in the area of money laundering and it seems to me that unless we close this loophole, it is not going to help us pass new money laundering legislation.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman agree to a unanimous consent request to add to his amendment the following:

(A) the results of an analysis of lie detector charts are used as the sole basis upon which an employee or prospective employee is discharged, dismissed, disciplined in any manner, or denied employment or promotion.

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman asks if I will accept the language which indicates:

(3) The exemption provided under this subsection shall not apply if—

(A) the results of an analysis of lie detector charts are used as the sole basis upon which an employee or prospective employee is discharged, dismissed, disciplined in any manner, or denied employment or promotion.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to accept that modification as part of the original amendment that I have offered. I understand the gentleman has offered this to each amendment and I would accept that modification.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

The Clerk read as follows:

Modification to this amendment offered by Mr. HUGHES: (3) The exemption provided under this subsection shall not apply if—

(A) the results of an analysis of lie detector charts are used as the sole basis upon which an employee or prospective employee is discharged, dismissed, disciplined in any manner, or denied employment or promotion.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, with the gentleman's acceptance of that modification, we have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, let me first salute my friend, the gentleman from New Jersey, my chairman on the Crime Subcommittee, for the work the gentleman has done to promote law enforcement in this country and particularly the bill on amending the Gun Act of 1968, which will be on this floor next week. I would commend the gentleman's bill to the floor for serious consideration.

But let me ask the gentleman this question. I do not oppose the gentleman's amendment, but may I ask the question, we are stretching this string so far. In reading the newspapers, I understand that money is laundered through pizza cuts. It is laundered through pizza restaurants. It is laundered through arrangements for haulage of freight and cargo.

The question is, the whole bill may be a dissuasion for the very kind of information we need, which is on money laundering.

So I will not oppose the gentleman's amendment, obviously, but is there any kind of an amendment that we could offer that would allow us to go across the board in trying to find money laundering activities?

Mr. HUGHES. Well, that would be very difficult and the gentleman makes a very valid point. The problem, however, with casinos is that large sums of money are in fact laundered and there are so many different devices——

I said to my colleagues that casinos present a unique problem, and that is one of the reasons why the regulations have been changed to require certain financial transactions to be recorded, particularly where there are large sums of cash which go through the casinos. This amendment is just targeted to those areas. There is no sense in the Federal Government conducting all of these investigations, requiring all of these reports to be filed if, in fact, a dishonest employee can ash can these reports and otherwise tamper with these reports that come in when large transactions go down in the casino.

Mr. MAZZOLI. If I could ask my friend one final question. As one who is so much of an expert in this area, is there anything in this bill, if it were to pass, that would impede our efforts to control money laundering?

Mr. HUGHES. No; I think the law enforcement community is probably adequately protected in the legislation.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I apologize, but we are having a great deal of problem understanding the gentleman's amendment because of the noise level. I want to be able to reconcile it with the action of this body turning down an exemption for financial institutions.

As I understand your amendment, it is narrowly drawn with respect to gambling institutions to those employees which may have an opportunity to launder money, and it is directed at organized crime.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] has expired.

(On request of Mr. JEFFORDS and by unanimous consent, Mr. HUGHES was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. The gentleman's amendment is directed at those employees that might have an opportunity in concert with other illegal entities to be able to launder money through the gambling institutions; is that correct?

Mr. HUGHES. That is correct. In fact, it is very limited because the test can only be administered to employees with responsibility for and in connection with assuring compliance with subchapter II of chapter 53 of title 31, United States Code, which deals with those transactions that are reported to the Federal Government.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will request the Clerk to read the modification to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], insert:

"(3) The exemption provided under this subsection shall not apply if—

"(A) the results of an analysis of lie detector charts are used as the sole basis upon which an employee or prospective employee is discharged, dismissed, disciplined in any manner, or denied employment or promotion."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. MARTINEZ]?

There was no objection.

The text of the amendment, as modified, is as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUGHES: Page 8, after line 15, insert the following new subsection:

(e) EXEMPTION FOR LEGALIZED GAMING ESTABLISHMENTS.—(1) This Act shall not prohibit the administration of a lie detector test to any employee of a legalized gaming establishment by such an establishment to the extent that—

(A) such use is consistent with—

(i) applicable State and local law, and

(ii) any negotiated collective bargaining agreement,

that limits or prohibits the use of lie detector tests on such employees; and

(B) the test is administered only to employees with responsibility for, and in connection with, assuring compliance with subchapter II of chapter 53 of title 31, United States Code.

(2) For purposes of this subsection the term "legalized gaming establishment" means any establishment operated under a comprehensive State regulatory system regulating casino gaming or gambling.

(3) The exemption provided under this subsection shall not apply if—

(A) the results of an analysis of lie detector charts are used as the sole basis upon which an employee or prospective employee is discharged, dismissed, disciplined in any manner, or denied employment or promotion.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I find it absolutely incredulous that we are going to exempt casinos while we include financial institutions in this bill. I mean, think about that, 14,000 banks, 3,000 savings and loans, 20,000 credit unions who handle billions and billions and billions of dollars of depositors' money, day after day after day. We say that they are not exempt from the bill, but we exempt casinos.

My colleagues, I am going to give you an opportunity to cast a vote on this particular amendment as I will ask for a recorded vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MITCHELL. You convince me. You have absolutely convinced me. We are opening this thing wider and wider. The last one on daycare, where a woman who cooks, does not have any access to the child, but one day might because somebody is out sick, might have to take that food up to the child has to get a polygraph test.

I think we have opened this up so wide that it is no longer a palatable bill for this Member, and I would find it exceedingly difficult to vote for it.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Chairman, I have a question of the gentleman from Indiana. Is what the gentleman saying that we are going to propose voting to exempt these gambling casinos, but not those members, those individuals who run a mom and pop shop, the small business person that belongs to the National Federation of Independent Businesses, these kinds of people are excluded from testing? Is that what the gentleman is saying?

Mr. HILER. That would be my interpretation, yes.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILER. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, Members need to understand that we are not with this amendment excepting the polygraphing of everyone that works in a casino. We did not except it for banks and we are not excepting it for casinos. We are excepting it for a very narrow group of people, very select, very few people who are in a position in the casino to launder large amounts of money that threatens the safety, the financial safety of America. That is why we are excepting in the amendment.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, I find it fascinating that laundering of money in casinos threatens the safety and soundness of the economic system when that same type of activity in a bank does not. I find that argument incredulous.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and to speak in support of the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. Chairman, I only wish that the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM] had been adopted because it would have covered casinos as a financial institution. This is an amendment which the gentleman from New Jersey Mr. [HUGHES] supported, as did I.

I urge all of my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, gaming is Nevada's No. 1 industry yielding approximately $148 million in annual revenues or 51 percent of the State's total revenues. Nevada's economy has the highest tourism dependency of any State in the Union, and more than 80 percent of Nevada's tourist spending is attributable to the presence of gaming. Nevada's gaming industry is strictly regulated by the State gaming commission making Nevada gaming the most closely scrutinized private industry in the country.

One of the tools the gaming industry uses to maintain these standards and strengthen licensing procedures is the polygraph. I believe this system of licensing and controls has worked well, eliminating abuses and providing employees adequate levels of protection against the misuse of the polygraph. The polygraph provides a strong deterrent to theft and other acts of willful misconduct which adversely affect the gaming industry.

For example, before polygraph tests were used, cash shortages at the Days Inn casino exceeded $1 million per year. Since the use of the polygraph, those losses have been cut dramatically, to less than 1 percent of the casino's gross. In another example, a majority of employees failed the polygraph when asked if they were selling and distributing drugs to casino patrons. In this instance, the polygraph helped the casino eliminate this activity and provide better service to its patrons.

Polygraphs have provided a valuable service to Nevada gaming employers in controlling cash handling, drug trafficking, and other related matters in cage, casino and slot operations. If H.R. 1524 is passed, it will be extremely difficult for casinos to police themselves and will add an extra burden on law enforcement officials in this area.

I believe legalized gaming casinos should be able to continue to use the polygraph so that the criminal element can be further reduced in the State of Nevada.

I support this amendment, and I hope my colleagues will support it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. FOLEY] having assumed the chair, Mr. GONZALEZ, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 1524), to prevent the denial of employment opportunities by prohibiting the use of lie detectors by employers involved in or affecting interstate commerce, pursuant to House Resolution 337, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 236, noes 173, not voting 25, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on, H.R. 1524, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOUCHER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CORRECTIONS IN THE ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 1524, EMPLOYEE POLYGRAPH PROTECTION ACT OF 1985

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill, the Clerk be authorized to make corrections in section numbers, punctuation, and cross-references and to make such other technical and conforming changes as may be necessary to reflect the actions of the House in amending the bill, H.R. 1524, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act of 1985.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 296, CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET FOR THE U.S. GOVERNMENT, 1987, 1988, 1989

Mrs. BURTON of California, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 99-491) on the resolution (H. Res. 397) providing for the consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 296) setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF THE CONFERENCE REPORT AND AN AMENDMENT REPORTED FROM CONFERENCE IN DISAGREEMENT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 534, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, 1986

Mrs. BURTON of California, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 99-492) on the resolution (H. Res. 398) waiving certain points of order against consideration of the conference report and an amendment reported from conference in disagreement on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 534) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 534), making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes, report that the conferees have been unable to agree. This is a technical disagreement, necessitated by the fact that the substitute language agreed to by the conferees includes a provision which would fall outside the normal range between the House provision and deletion of the House provision as was proposed by the Senate.

It is the intention of the conferees that the managers on the part of the House will offer a motion in the House to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment consisting of the language agreed to in conference, and that upon the adoption of such amendment in the House, the managers on the part of the Senate will offer a motion in the Senate to concur therein.

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate submit the following joint statement in explanation of the action agreed upon by the managers:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Amendment No. 1. Reported in technical disagreement. The managers on the part of the House will offer a motion to recede and concur in the amendment of the Senate with an amendment as follows:

Restore the matter stricken by said amendment, amended to read as follows:

: Provided further, That after fiscal year 1987, funds available to the Corporation may be used to carry out section 1241(a)(1) of the Food Security Act of 1985, only to such extent or in such amounts as provided in advance in appropriations Acts. The sign-up agreement should not reduce total production below levels needed to meet domestic needs, maintain the supply line, and provide for an adequate supply for export by either the Commodity Credit Corporation or private corporations or individuals at competitive prices; since by law the proceeds from sales become available for use by the Commodity Credit Corporation, such sales should reduce future appropriations: Provided further, That the conservation reserve program shall not replace or reduce any existing conservation program.

The level of funds previously appropriated for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration, as provided in the Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1986 for Agriculture, Rural Development, and Related Agencies (H.R. 3037), as enacted by Public Law 99-190 on December 19, 1985, shall be available until expended except as that level may be reduced by the terms of the sequester order implemented on March 1, 1986.

The managers on the part of the Senate will move to concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

The conference agreement deletes House language which provided that after fiscal year 1986, funds available to the Commodity Credit Corporation to carry out the conservation reserve program and the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation program shall be available only to such extent or in such amounts as provided in advance in appropriations Acts.

The conference agreement includes language that the sign-up agreement for the conservation reserve program should not reduce total production below levels needed to meet domestic needs, maintain the supply line, and provide for an adequate supply for export by either the Commodity Credit Corporation or private corporations or individuals at competitive prices.

The conference agreement also provides that the conservation reserve program shall not replace or reduce any existing conservation program.

The Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1986 (H.R. 3037), as enacted by Public Law 99-190 on December 19, 1985, provided $2.7 billion for direct operating loans. The conferees insist that the funds provided in the Appropriations Act remain available for fiscal year 1986, and remain available until expended, except as that level may be reduced by the terms of the sequester order implemented on March 1, 1986.

COMMODITY SUPPLEMENTAL FOOD PROGRAM

The conferees have been advised that the Department plans to use commodity supplemental food program funds to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for donated surplus commodities. The conferees have agreed these funds shall not be used for reimbursement until this proposal has been reviewed by the appropriate committees of Congress.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE HONORABLE F. JAMES SENSENBRENNER, JR., MEMBER OF CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Honorable F. JAMES SENSENBRENNER, Jr.:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 25, 1986.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL,
Speaker, House of Representatives, H-204, Capitol, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to notify you, pursuant to Rule L(50) of the Rules of the House of Representatives, that Thomas Schreibel, Patricia Piekenbrock, and James Murphy of my district office, and Paul Zanowski formerly of my district office and currently in my Washington office, have been served with subpoenas issued by the Circuit Court for the State of Wisconsin, Waukesha County. After consultation with the General Counsel to the Clerk, I will notify you of my determinations as required by the House Rules.

Sincerely,

F. JAMES SENSENBRENNER, Jr.,
Member of Congress.

LET'S GIVE NEGOTIATIONS ONE LAST CHANCE

(Mr. SKELTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, last week I joined a number of our colleagues here in the House in a meeting with Secretary of State George Shultz concerning the proposed assistance package to the Nicaraguan Contras. At that meeting I suggested some additions to the administration's proposal to reassure Members about the administration's intentions. Today I am sending a letter to the President restating my proposal which includes the following points:

Renewed efforts of the Contadoran negotiations with a time limit lasting no longer than 90 days. This gives negotiations one last chance.

That the aid package be split into two parts—humanitarian aid to be dispersed immediately and military aid to be dispersed after a 90-day period should negotiations fail.

A broadening of the resistance forces who would be eligible for assistance.

More attention to human rights by the Contras.

That defensive weapons be supplied immediately to defend against Sandinista air and armored attack during the 90-day period.

That military training of the Contras begin immediately so that if negotiations fail they will not have lost time.

Mr. Speaker, it is now our hope that the President will give serious attention to the proposals that I have outlined. Our Nation needs an effective bipartisan program to deal with the difficult situation we face in Nicaragua. I include a copy of my letter in the RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, March 12, 1986.

Hon. RONALD REAGAN,
1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Together with several other Democratic Members of the House, I had the opportunity to meet with Secretary of State Shultz on Thursday March 6 concerning the proposed assistance package to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance forces, the "contras". At that time, I suggested to the Secretary that you consider a few additional measures as a way to reassure the undersigned about the Administration's intentions.

My proposal to Secretary Shultz included the following points:

1. that there be a renewed effort of the Contadora negotiations with a time limit lasting no longer than 90 days;

2. that the aid package be split into two parts—humanitarian aid, to be disbursed immediately; military aid, to be disbursed after a 90-day period should negotiations fail;

3. that the resistance forces to receive both humanitarian and military aid be broadened to include Misurasata, BOS, and any other resistance group whose aim is the establishment of a genuinely democratic process in Nicaragua;

4. that measures to improve the attention given to human rights by the resistance forces be intensified;

5. that defensive weapons be supplied immediately to the broadened resistance forces to defend against air and armored attacks, but only for these defensive purposes during the 90-day period;

6. that military training of the resistance forces begin immediately so that if negotiations fail they will be able to go into action with a greater assurance of success;

7. that at the end of the 90-day period, if negotiations fail, the Administration report to the proper authorizing committees the progress or lack of progress that has been made with respect to the six points listed above. Included in that report should be a separate section updating the progress made in fulfilling the recommendations made by the Kissinger Commission in January 1984.

Let me explain the thinking behind the seven points in my proposal. Broadly speaking the effort here is to follow a two-track approach: (1) giving negotiations one last chance and (2) preparing the "contras" to continue the fight should negotiations fail. I hope that the second track will actually put pressure on the Sandinistas to negotiate seriously.

A renewed negotiating effort with Ambassador Habib, a well-respected career diplomat, will enable the Administration to convince some of its skeptics that a good faith effort towards a negotiated settlement is being made. By limiting the negotiating period to no longer than 90 days the pressure would be placed on the Sandinistas to either make meaningful concessions or reveal themselves as uninterested in serious negotiations. They could no longer hope to stretch out negotiations indefinitely with the real purpose being that of consolidating power.

By splitting the aid package in two parts the United States will give further proof of wanting to come to an agreement with the Sandinistas while at the same time not breaking faith with the democratic resistance. The "contras" need continuing US humanitarian support now, if only to show US resolve. Immediate disbursement of humanitarian aid will fulfill this need. Military aid will serve two purposes: first, to put pressure on the Sandinistas to negotiate seriously; second, to prepare the resistance forces to go into action should negotiations fail.

The purpose in expanding the list of resistance forces receiving aid is to give support to those groups that have been neglected in past efforts. One group, Misurasata, has managed to secure the bulk of the Atlantic coastal Indian territory against military attacks of the Nicaraguan Army. Whether they are formally a part of the United Nicaraguan Opposition or not should not matter. Theirs is a genuinely popular resistance that merits the support of the United States. Similar other resistance forces should also be supported.

Attention to human rights is a crucial part of any assistance we give to the resistance forces. Any effort to put pressure on the Sandinistas will fail if serious attention to correcting abuses by the resistance forces is not put into effect. This should be included in the training effort of the resistance forces that I have called for in point six.

The purpose in supplying defensive weapons, shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles, is to enable the resistance forces to fend off M1-24 helicopter attacks. Protection against such attacks is a legitimate defensive effort that should be permitted during the 90 day period of negotiations.

Mr. President, we hope that you will give serious attention to these matters so that we can put together an effective, bipartisan program to deal with the difficult situation we face in Nicaragua.

Sincerely,

Ike Skelton.

SOFT ON LOGIC, LONG ON FANTASY

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, since 1981 the Reagan administration has spent $3.4 billion in foreign assistance in Central America. While the President's policy of militarization of the region has not rooted out the Sandinistas, he is now saying another $100 million will do the trick.

This weekend President Belasario Betancur of Colombia, the leader of the Contadora movement in Latin America, repeated his opposition to more American aid to the Contras. President Betancur and I have been friends for several years, and I know him to be a man of extraordinary courage and commitment. In an interview reported in the Washington Post Monday, President Betancur said:

I think that an initiative such as the request for $100 million * * * is wrong. I know we can get more through negotiation. I know that the Reagan administration is aware of the fact that Latin America has its own language and that language is expressed through Contadora.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Reagan suggests that those who oppose his war in Central America are soft on communism, and long on naivete. President Betancur's comments make it clear that in Latin America, Mr. Reagan's policy in Central America is soft on logic and long on fantasy.

CONTRA AID "WRONG," COLOMBIAN DECLARES

(By Bradley Graham)

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA, March 9.—President Belisario Betancur, a leading opponent of military intervention in Central America, says the Reagan administration's request for $100 million in aid to anti-Sandinista Nicaraguan rebels is "wrong" and "will not produce good results."

In an interview, the Colombian leader, a founder of the Contadora group of eight Latin American states proposing a negotiated peace in Central America, said "all of Latin America doesn't like the Reagan proposal" and urged the U.S. president to talk with, not fight the Sandinistas in Nicaragua.

"I think that an initiative such as the request for $100 million taken by President Reagan is wrong," said Betancur. "I know we can get more through negotiation. I know that the Reagan administration is aware of the fact that Latin America has its own language, and that language is expressed through Contadora."

The extent of Latin American support for the aid request has been a point of controversy in Washington. Administration officials contend that some Latin American leaders do not want to endorse the plan publicly for domestic political reasons but that privately they are sympathetic with the U.S. anti-Sandinista campaign.

Betancur's firm opposition was expressed during a 45-minute interview Friday assessing his four-year term in office, which ends in August. Colombians went to the polls today to elect a new Congress in a vote that foreshadows presidential elections in May. The Colombian constitution prevents presidents from seeking a second consecutive term.

A man of peasant background and populist political skills, Betancur, 63, was elected on a platform of achieving peace at home with leftist guerrillas and abroad between warring groups in Central America. Although the peace agreements he sought are far from being realized fully, Betancur said he has established a legacy of negotiation on both fronts. He is constitutionally prohibited from running for a second consecutive term.

The silver-haired leader calmly rejected the claims of critics on both the right and the left who regard his peace policies as having disintegrated in the fact of mounting guerrilla warfare in Colombia and heightened tensions between the United States and Nicaragua. He said he had established an "anti-Vietnam approach" to armed conflict in the region, an approach of "dialogue and agreement" that, he added, is now irreversible, at least in Colombia.

"It is also the philosophy of the Contadora group," he said. "It consists in telling the guerrilla groups in Central America: Why not talk, why not search for diplomatic solutions and negotiate?"

The Contadora process is stalled at the moment over the refusal of the Sandinistas to talk with the rebels, known as contras—short for counterrevolutionaries—and U.S. refusal to resume conversations with the Nicaraguan government under existing circumstances.

Despite Betancur's emphasis on negotiated solutions, his own room to maneuver with guerrilla groups in Colombia was dramatically called into question last November, when security forces stormed Bogota's main courthouse, which had been seized by April 19 Movement (M19) guerrillas, killing not only the terrorists but also 11 of 24 Supreme Court members and more than 50 other hostages held inside.

A number of Colombians and foreign analysts suspect that military leaders, who were never comfortable with the peace process, moved against the guerrillas without consulting Betancur, leaving the president to assume responsibility for the massacre to uphold the image of civilian authority. Since then, the Army has increased operations against M19 and other smaller guerrilla groups concentrated in southern Colombia.

Defending the institutional integrity of his government, Betancur reiterated that he had been in full charge during the 27-hour siege at the Palace of Justice. He said military forces had been permitted to continue advancing on the building to prevent the guerrillas from consolidating their position inside.

He blamed the M19 attackers for the carnage, saying they had refused to drop their guns and accept his nonnegotiable offer of a fair civilian court trail if the hostages were released. He said he had been willing to "converse" with the guerrillas, "offer them a way out, a solution," but not "negotiate" with them after they had taken over the building, killing guards and others.

Asked why, several hours after the midday attack began, he had declined to take a frantic telephone call from a trapped Supreme Court president pleading for a cease-fire that might have permitted a dialogue, Betancur said he has passed the call to police Gen. Victor Alberto Delgado "because the operation taking place was a military operation, directed by the police chief."

The president was reluctant to discuss other details of the incident. He noted that a special judiciary commission was due to report this month on the siege.

Countering public perceptions that full-scale guerrilla warfare has resumed, Betancur said that a two-year-old cease-fire with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, the country's oldest and largest rebel movement, remains in effect. Government and FARC representatives signed an agreement a week ago extending the truce indefinitely, and FARC has set up a political front, the Patriotic Union, which is running candidates in this year's elections.

Betancur said dealing with Colombian guerrillas has been complicated by the contrasting nature of various groups. FARC, for instance, which Betancur said represents 90 percent of the insurgents, is linked to the Communist Party, while the M19 is a nationalist force with no clear international ideological connection.

Moreover, said Betancur, violence has been chronic in Colombia. "We are trying to solve a problem 40 years old," said the president. "That's not possible overnight. What I'm satisfied with is having brought the peace process to a point of no return."

Betancur said investment in poor regions where guerrillas recruit will be the government's best defense against subversion. He said legislation passed last year authorizing the election instead of appointment of mayors starting in 1988, and facilitating the formation of new parties, will widen participation in politics.

VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCRIPTWRITING WINNER FROM MISSISSIPPI

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, each year the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and its ladies auxiliary sponsor the Voice of Democracy scriptwriting contest. More than 250,000 secondary school students participated this year, competing for six national scholarships. The theme of this year's contest was "New Horizons For America's Youth."

During the 24 years of VFW sponsorship, more than 5 million students have participated and awards have been given totaling over $3 million, ranging from scholarships to savings bonds.

I am proud to say that the 1986 Mississippi winner resides in my congressional district. He is Daniel Duke Brown of Starkville. Dan is a junior at Starkville High School, where he has been an outstanding student. I want to share his winning essay with my colleagues.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

(By Dan Brown)

Today, America's youth can look forward to ever-broadening horizons in educational, vocational, and technological areas. Among the most important events in our lifetimes: We've seen the transformation of the computer from a room-filling giant to a desk top friend; we've seen preparations for the colonization of space, and we've taken a part in the video revolution. In the area of education, today's youth can look forward to better and less costly schools. Colleges and Universities all across the U.S. are extending their programs, to include every possible interest of the student. In addition, many states are enacting educational reform bills to improve education in public schools. In vocational areas, we've seen labor saving tools and techniques introduced in the work place increasing output. We've seen the decline of government in business and the stabilization of the economy, leaving the door wide open to new businesses. In agriculture, newer, more productive strains are being used in farming to improve yields.

Most important to our lives, however, have been the numerous advances in technology. As mentioned before, the computer has been the most significant invention yet in the area of research. It alone has the power to answer previously unanswerable questions. The youth of today have the ability to use this powerful instrument in ways never thought of. Another advancement in the areas of technology is the utilization of different forms of energy. Today's youth may see cleaner and cheaper energy sources in their future making more powerful tools such as lasers commmonplace. America's youth also have the ability to explore two unknown regions: space and the sea.

Space! Only 16 years ago the U.S. put a man on the moon. Since then we have sent up stations, probes, and shuttles, not to mention hundreds of satellites. Space travel is becoming more of a reality with every launch of our fleet of space shuttles. America's youth are no longer earthbound. We lead all other nations in the exploration of this unknown region; however, here on earth man still does not fully understand the ocean. Of all the areas on earth, the ocean is the only one left unexplored. Deep-sea exploration is important to the future of man. The ocean may become an important supplier of minerals, food, and even energy.

One other field that broadens horizons for America's youth is the medical field. Important, life-saving discoveries are made in this field almost every day. With the experimentation of artificial body parts, and research on incurable diseases such as AIDS, important questions are left to be answered by America's youth. As Henry David Thoreau once said, "The youth gets together his materials to build a bridge to the moon, or perchance, a palace or temple on the earth, and, at length, the middle-aged man concludes to build a woodshed with them." As you can see, today's youth have new horizons to work towards and what has been mentioned is only a small sample of what is in store for America's greatest resource—her youth.

SOME THOUGHTS ON THE 48TH ANNIVERSARY OF MY INTRODUCTION TO FREEDOM IN THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to note the 48th anniversary of my arrival in the United States of America.

On March 12, 1938, with my mother, of blessed memory, and my sister, we pulled into New York Harbor on the U.S.S. President Harding after a very difficult 9-day voyage. I remember that on that Saturday morning especially in this year when we have such a tremendous focus and renewed attention on the Statue of Liberty and what it stands for, that I was taken along the railing, and an elderly gentleman who had become my guide on the ship, told me to wait, wait until the statue came into sight. Indeed it was an awesome and magnificent and a very welcoming sight after that difficult crossing.

The trip and our arrival coincided with the Nazis increasing their coming to power in Europe.

The day before we landed in New York Harbor on March 11, 1938, was the day of the Anschluss, it was the day when Hitler triumphantly marched into Austria to be welcomed by the Austrian population as the celebration of the union between Austria and Germany.

I have special reason to be grateful to the United States of America and to its people for allowing me and my family the safe haven of that day in that era. Others in my family were not so fortunate. My grandparents on both sides and countless uncles, aunts, cousins, and other relatives did not survive the Holocaust, and I am sure that had I not been fortunate enough to come here the chance of my survival would have been extremely limited.

So on each March 12 I recall, indeed I look forward to the date with anticipation. Those who have had the good fortune to arrive in this country as immigrants, I think, recall the date of our arrival before we recall any other date that we celebrate, it is probably more important as a date to us than our birth date or any other anniversary celebration.

I think it ought to be so because it is indeed the occasion and the marking of a rebirth, an opportunity for rebirth which this country has meant to me as it has to so many others who preceded me and who followed me.

I shall be eternally grateful to this country for giving me the opportunities which would not have been present even under normal circumstances in Hungary.

I came from a small village, of a family which was a very distinct minority, Jewish, and not at all wealthy or affluent.

My grandfather was a dealer in grains and feathers. The problem of anyone not of affluent means receiving the opportunity for education beyond the sixth grade was extremely limited at that time.

So whatever I am, whatever I have achieved I really own to my good fortune in having had the opportunity to spend the bulk of my life in the United States of America.

20/20/20 BUDGET ALTERNATIVE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, as the House prepares to debate a fiscal year 1987 budget resolution I hope Members will seriously consider the budget alternative I am introducing today. Briefly, this resolution sets a deficit target of $130.5 billion for fiscal year 1987—well below the $144 billion level mandated by the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 by:

Freezing defense spending for savings of $20 billion;

Freezing most domestic spending programs for savings of $20 billion;

Raising revenues by $20 billion in fiscal year 1987.

20/20/20 is the sort of bold alternative we need to meet the deficit target required by law, to stop this process of nickel-dime deficit reduction that avoids tough choices, and to avoid the massive automatic cuts which will be required if that target is not met.

We are now experiencing in Federal domestic programs the effects of a 4.3-percent automatic cut, or sequestration, required by the balanced budget law. Many saw this as a small, insignificant cut a few months ago, but there is no doubt today that it is causing havoc in many of our most valuable Federal programs and it has had a real impact on the lives of people who depend on these programs.

As we proceed through the budget process this year the overriding goal must be to avoid another sequestration starting this October 1. If deficit reductions are not enacted which bring us to the $144 billion deficit target, we will be forced to watch helplessly as domestic cuts are made by the Gramm-Rudman process. Estimates of the magnitude of the cuts needed to reduce the deficit have already been calculated: In defense we could see reductions in budget authority of up to $60 billion below the President's request, and in domestic programs cuts of up to 20 percent would be triggered.

There is no argument that a sequestration of this size would undermine our national security and devastate Federal programs like law enforcement, air safety, and a variety of programs designed to aid low-income Americans—programs that all of us recognize are essential responsibilities of Government.

To avoid this catastrophic event we must adopt a budget resolution which guarantees that the $144 billion target is met, pass appropriation bills and a reconciliation bill implementing that resolution—all by August 20, the date CBO and OMB will issue their report on where the deficit will be in relation to the $144 billion target.

Our first deadline under the new law is April 15. By then the House and Senate must pass budget resolutions.

THREE TESTS

Any budget resolution we pass must meet three tests:

Balance: It must demand an equal contribution from all of the three major areas of the budget—defense spending, domestic spending, and revenues

Fairness: It must protect essential low-income programs, and it must not ask specific programs to bear an unfair amount of the deficit reduction burden.

A deficit lower than 144: To ensure that changes in the economy or spending trends do not increase the deficit and trigger automatic cuts, a deficit target well below $144 billion must be set in the budget resolution.

I believe this last test is one most budget alternatives will flunk. Many in the House and the Senate are going to be satisfied with simply meeting, at least on paper, the $144 billion target. Settling for this modest achievement would, in my judgment, be a terrible mistake. Even in good years we have not hit our targets in reconciliation and in discretionary spending, and when you factor in economic changes the result, all too often, has been a little like shooting an air ball in basketball—you totally miss the target.

This has been true for every year I have been in Congress, and it would be a great mistake for us to ignore the possibility—one can almost say probability—of the numbers changing on us in midstream.

We all know how difficult it is to predict economic conditions and spending patterns. This year, with the drop in oil prices, the economy might just fulfill the optimistic projections of OMB and CBO. On the other hand, the unemployment rate jumped by 0.6 percent in February, the largest 1-month increase in almost 6 years. We cannot ignore the fall last January in the Commerce Department's index of leading economic indicators, or the continuing large trade deficit. The point is this: We all hope for continued healthy growth, but even as we bathe in the warm glow of current economic conditions we cannot ignore the volatility of the economy, and the impact unforeseen changes will have on the budget deficit.

The bottom line is that the Congress cannot be certain exactly what will be achieved out of any deficit reduction package or what the economy has in store for us. We can gamble that a deficit reduction package that, at least on paper, appears to reach $144 billion will be enough. But that gamble is a recipe for automatic cuts in October. A wiser approach is to aim for a deficit well below $144 billion. This will give us some room to accommodate changes in the economy and guarantee that any minor or major failures in our attempt at deficit reduction this year will not be penalized by sequestration in October.

Finally, on the bright side, if the economy turns out to be as strong or stronger as many think it will be, taking a bigger chunk out of the deficit this year will make it that much easier to reach the deficit targets set in law for fiscal years 1988 through 1991. Beyond that, it will finally give us the opportunity to begin to invest in this Nation's future instead of constantly stealing from our priorities to pay the bills.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

The only budget currently before us is the President's budget. His budget, which was rejected last week by the Senate Budget Committee, fails all three tests.

It increases defense spending by $30 billion, while burdening domestic programs with cuts of $24 billion;

It hits low income programs with cuts of over $4 billion;

It fails even to hit the $144 billion target—CBO estimates that the President's policies will result in a deficit of $160 billion, $16 billion off the mark.

In contrast, a 20/20/20 approach satisfies the three crucial priorities:

It is balanced: It requires an equivalent deficit reduction contribution, $20 billion, from each major portion of the budget: defense, domestic spending and revenues. It also reflects the Gramm-Rudman formula for deficit reduction on the spending side: 50 percent from defense and 50 percent from nondefense.

It is fair: All of the low-income programs exempted from cuts under Gramm-Rudman—AFDC, WIC, food stamps, SSI, Child Nutrition, Medicaid, veterans' compensation, and veterans' pensions—are protected in this proposal. Furthermore the freeze approach guarantees that specific programs are not asked to bear an unfair amount of the deficit reduction burden.

Finally, the package addresses the economic projection issue by reducing the deficit well below the $144 billion target—to $130.5 billion. Because the economy is currently strong, now is the time to set more ambitious goals for the Congress on deficit reduction—if we can take the deficit below $144 billion with a national budget then we should not miss this opportunity to do so. And, as I explained above, if the economic projections for fiscal year 1987 do not pan out we will need a cushion to avoid automatic cuts under the Gramm-Rudman law. The $60 billion deficit reduction package I favor would provide this protection.

Following my statement is a more detailed description of 20/20/20 and the alternative in budget resolution form.

There will be a temptation this year, an election year, to avoid the hard choices and to pull together a deficit reduction package that contains questionable savings and is just big enough to hit the $144 billion target. This is no time to hide from the tough choices. Instead, I believe the public is prepared to accept strong leadership on this issue. A bold approach not only takes the political high ground but gets us away from the quicksand of year to year budget ambivalence. 20/20/20 puts us within striking distance of the outyear deficit targets, and brings the deficit down quickly to a level where it will no longer be a drag on our Nation's future economic growth.

Finally, I would like to comment on the situation regarding the constitutionality of the automatic spending cut process under the new balanced budget law. Some believe the Supreme Court will bail us out of the need for meeting the $144 billion target if it upholds the lower court's decision that the guts of the Gramm-Rudman law—the automatic cut procedure—is unconstitutional. The Court may very well decide this, and in fact most experts expect this result in June. A note of caution must be sounded here, however. Congress, and more specifically the "Temporary Joint Committee on Deficit Reduction"—established by the balanced budget law as part of a fallback procedure to be used in the event the automatic sequestration process is declared unconstitutional—will still be receiving a report from OMB and CBO on August 20 of this year with: First, findings on the size of the deficit; and second, spending cuts needed to eliminate this gap in the form of across-the-board percentage reductions in defense and domestic programs.

The alternative to the joint committee simply submitting this draft order to the House and Senate for approval is for both Houses to have a legitimate deficit reduction effort in place which eliminates any excess deficit over $144 billion. Without this effort I fear there will be enormous pressure to simply approve the draft sequestration order and send it to the President, and the result could be devastating cuts in defense and domestic programs just before the November elections—an event I assume neither party wants to be responsible for. Or, alternatively, Congress can just ignore the CBO-OMB report and abandon the effort to meet a specific deficit goal for fiscal year 1987. This will only fuel efforts to push a constitutional balanced budget amendment or a line-item veto as deficit cure-alls. The vehicle for these proposals will, of course, be the next debt ceiling increase which will have to be voted on next fall.

So the Supreme Court eliminating the automatic cut procedure of the balanced budget legislation does not mean that the pressure is off, or that we are going to get a free ride this year.

The key to maneuvering ourselves into a position where we will not be faced with the choice of voting for automatic cuts or abandoning the goal of a $144 billion deficit is to agree on a realistic, hard-hitting budget resolution soon, and then implement its goals with action on appropriation bills and reconciliation. If we have the right budget resolution and a commitment to enforce it, we can either eliminate the excess deficit before August 20 or be well on our way to eliminating it by that date, in which case the joint committee will not be forced to act on the OMB–CBO report.

I believe 20/20/20 is the budget resolution which will make those automatic cuts unnecessary, which takes us below the $144 billion target in a fair, balanced way, and that places us on a path which will avoid further devastating cuts in the outyears.

The need is to end this constant deficit struggle once and for all. Every priority, every increase is dominated by the debate over the deficit. This nation has been unable to take a positive stride forward during the last 5 years because of its inability to resolve the deficit crisis. That tragic and depressing process must end. The time for tough choices is now.

I hope all members will seriously consider this approach to deficit reduction.

The following is a description of the 20/20/20 proposal and the text of the resolution:

FY 87 BUDGET OPTION: 20/20/20

Described below is a deficit reduction option for the Fiscal Year 1987 budget which:

Freezes defense spending at the FY 1986 Budget Authority level for savings of $20 billion in outlays;

Freezes most domestic spending programs at FY 1986 levels for savings of $20 billion in outlays;

Increases revenues by $20 billion in FY 1987.

This proposal, along with enactment of last year's reconciliation bill, reaches a deficit of approximately $130 billion in fiscal year 1987—well below the Gramm-Rudman target of $144 billion. This deficit reduction plan would ensure that weaker-than-projected economic conditions would not act to increase the deficit to the extent that automatic spending reductions in defense and domestic programs are triggered.

	Billions
Baseline deficit	$194
Defense reductions	−$20
Domestic reductions	−$20
Revenue increases	−$20
FY 86 reconciliation	−$4
Remaining deficit	$130

BASELINE DEFICIT

The baseline deficit reflects the Congressional Budget Office baseline deficit projection ($181 billion) plus the President's defense request as reestimated by CBO.

CBO has reestimated the President's defense outlay number—what outlays will flow from his budget authority request—upwards by almost $15 billion, as follows:

President's request:
Budget authority	320
Outlay	282
Outlay adjustment:
Budget authority
Outlay	+15
President's reestimated:
Budget authority	320
Outlay	297

In the CBO baseline defense outlays total $284 billion (based on 0 percent real growth), making the difference between the President's reestimated outlay figure and the CBO defense baseline $13 billion. This $13 billion is added to the CBO baseline deficit to reflect the President's defense request, creating a new baseline deficit of $194 billion.

	Billions
CBO Baseline Deficit	$181
Adjustment based on President's Defense request	+13
New Baseline Deficit	194

Defense spending: $20 billion.

CBO estimates that a BA freeze in defense (function 050) totals $292 billion in BA and $277 billion in outlays. Off the President's reestimated outlay total of $297 billion this is a savings of $20 billion. (note: off the CBO baseline the savings would be $7 billion)

Domestic spending: $20 billion.

COLA freeze: $5.0 billion.

CBO estimates that a COLA freeze in non-means tested programs would save approximately $6.0 billion. $1.0 billion would be set aside for the protection of low-income recipients for a total savings of $5.0 billion.

Medicare freeze: $3.0 billion.

CBO estimates that a freeze in the Medicare program would save almost $3.0 billion.

Pay freeze: $1.0 billion.

CBO estimates that freezing Federal civilian pay would save $1.0 billion.

Domestic freeze: $4.0 billion.

A freeze in other domestic programs would result in savings of approximately $4.0 billion. The low-income programs exempt from cuts under Gramm-Rudman (SSI, WIC, Food Stamp, AFDC, Child Nutrition, Medicaid, Veterans' compensation and Veterans' pensions) would not be frozen.

Sale of Conrail: $1.2 billion.

Estimates for the proceeds from sale of Conrail range from $1.2 to $1.8 billion.

User fees: −$3.0 billion.

The President has proposed a variety of user fees totalling over $3.0 billion in fiscal year 1987.

Interest savings: −$3.0 billion.

Reduced interest costs resulting from $60 billion in deficit reductions for FY 1987 total approximately $3.0 billion.

	Billion
COLA freeze	$−5.0
Medicare freeze	−3.0
Civilian pay freeze	−1.0
Other domestic freeze	−4.0
Conrail sale	−1.2
User fees	−3.0
Interest savings	−3.0
Total domestic savings	20.2

Revenue increases: −$20 billion

The following are options that could be considered in raising revenues in FY 87 by $20.0 billion over current law. All estimates are from the Congressional Budget Office.

	Billion
Revenue increases proposed in the President's budget	$6.3
5 percent Corporate Surtax	3.9
10 percent Corporate Surtax	7.8
Corporate Minimum Tax	5.0 to 12.0

$5 per barrel oil import fee	7.4
$5 per barrel tax on all oil	20.4
12 cents per gallon increase in motor fuel tax	10.4
5 percent on all energy consumption	13.9
Increase Taxation of Non-Means Tested Entitlement Benefits	5.6
Tax Non-Retirement Fringe Benefits	9.8
Superfund provisions in Reconciliation	1.3
5 percent tax or VAT (exemptions for Food, Housing and Medical Care)	42.4
Freeze indexing for one year	4.4
Limit entertainment deductions	.5

EVENTS IN KOREA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, although the spotlight of world opinion has been focused on the Philippines in the last few weeks, disturbing events in another Asian country closely allied with the United States should not be ignored.

In the last month, the South Korean Government has clamped down harshly on a campaign to collect 10 million signatures supporting constitutional revisions to elect the President by popular vote. Opposition leaders Kim Dae Jung and Kim Young Sam were placed under house arrest as were 80 legislators, virtually the entire opposition in Korea's parliament, the National Assembly. More than 200 other officials of the New Korea Democratic Party [NKDP] were detained in their homes to prevent the holding of the party's central committee. Heavy police barricades were drawn around the headquarters of the NKDP and the Council for the Promotion of Democracy, the group responsible for the petition drive. Just yesterday, riot police broke up student rallies in support of election reforms at two campuses in Seoul.

Tragically, these actions are but the latest in a series of repressive moves by the Korean Government against its own people. Respected international human rights organizations have documented serious human rights violations in Korea, including harassment of the political opposition, restrictions on the press, confiscation of "banned" books, the firing of university administrators, imprisonment of labor union activists and the intimidation of student leaders.

Most alarming, there are now more prisoners jailed for political offenses than at any other time in Chun's 6-year-long reign. The use of excessive force by the police is pervasive and credible reports of torture increased significantly last year, according to the State Department.

As a democratic nation, the United States simply cannot condone the continued abridgment of freedoms we take for granted. In my view, the old arguments used to excuse the severe restrictions of rights in Korea are wholly inadequate. The North Korean threat, while real and significant, is no justification for repression in South Korea. We face potential annihilation from the Soviet Union, but still operate as a democracy. In Korea too, the key to long-term stability is movement toward genuine democratic traditions and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that comparisons with the Philippines are not very appropriate for Korea. Korea's economy is far stronger. It does not suffer inadequacy in military preparedness, nor does it require the military reforms so sorely needed in the Philippines. However, one lesson does seem worth heeding: President Marcos lost his mandate to rule as he violated the rights of his people and frustrated their longing for democratic rule.

Americans fought and many lost their lives to preserve the freedom of Korea and the right of its citizens. The time has come—indeed is overdue—for the Korean Government to restore to its citizens the control of their own destiny.

The 1988 summer Olympic games will be held in Seoul. The whole world's attention will be directed toward Korea and expectations are very high. Now is the time for decisive political steps in Seoul to end the crackdown on dissent and the other abusive practices that only work to tarnish the image of South Korea in the world. We in the U.S. Congress are hopeful that the Chun government will reverse the present trend and open up the political process in Korea. We are watching and waiting.

THE BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk a little bit about a subject that is going to be before us tomorrow; namely, the budget, and deal with some of the realities of where we are in the budget process as compared to some of the things that we have said about the budget process that bear on no reality at all.

I want to begin, though, this evening by acknowledging a point brought to my attention yesterday by the Parliamentarians after a speech I made during the 1-minute times on the budget. At that point, I had indicated that the budget that had been introduced by Chairman GRAY was a budget that reflected a figure larger than the Gramm-Rudman figure. I was on the front page of the bill indicating a figure of about $159 billion in deficit which, of course, is above the $144 billion deficit reduction target that Gramm-Rudman calls for. It was pointed out to me by the parliamentary staff that indeed on page 2 there is another deficit target that is the one that is the official deficit target, that it is in fact $143.6 billion, under the $144 billion that we set for Gramm-Rudman. So, in fact, the budget does comply with Gramm-Rudman. I wish to make that correction.

However, that particular correction still does not get at the basic issue that I raised in the course of those remarks yesterday, and that is when that budget was introduced by Chairman GRAY, it was introduced, according to the language within the bill, by request.

I had an opportunity to talk to the chairman briefly today, and I ask the chairman who requested him to put the bill in. The chairman informed me that it was the administration. I did some checking and found out the administration did not ask the chairman to put it in. I informed the chairman of that, and the chairman said that the administration came before his committee and testified that they wanted a vote on their budget and, therefore, the chairman assumed that that was the request.

I would say that that is a rather unique procedure, based upon how we normally have requests brought to the House floor through the bill process, or have bills introduced by request. Normally, if the administration wants it requested, they simply send a letter to the Hill asking someone to put a bill in on their behalf. That certainly was not done in this instance. It is one more example of what I would call political gamesmanship being done here on the budget without really producing a budget.

The real issue facing this Congress right now is, Where is the Democratic budget? We have the President's budget. We have had it now for 2 months. We have had a chance to examine it. The Budget Committee has done some detailed examinations, including running around the country asking people about the budget. We have had a lot of examination. We know that there are problems in there. We know that there are things that we want to change. In fact, there are things that have to be changed just based upon the economic performance of the present time. You cannot take the President's budget as it was basically done in January and apply it to present circumstances, because the economy has changed significantly in 2 months. It is significantly better 2 months down the road. We want to figure in that change in the economy in any kind of budget plans that we make.

But, instead, what we have had introduced here is a static document developed 2 or 3 months ago and brought to the House.

What we do not have is the majority party's budget.

It seems to me that the exercise that we are going to go through tomorrow of bringing the President's budget in static terms to this floor for an up or down vote without having the alternative budget presented by the majority party in this body is a cynical political ploy that has no basis whatsoever in budget reality. It is a delaying tactic in my mind that is designed purely to paper over the fact that the Democrats have been unable to produce their own budget.

Mr. Speaker, I suspect, I must say, that it goes even deeper than that, because the one thing about the President's budget that I think merits our attention is the fact the President met the Gramm-Rudman targets. He met the balanced budget law targets without raising taxes. There was no tax increase in the President's budget. Yet, we have heard over the several weeks of listening on this House floor, Democrats come to the well here time after time after time suggesting that there needed to be some grand compromise ultimately on the budget that includes tax increases.

My guess is that one of the ploys we are going through tomorrow is to reject the budget that has no tax increases in it in order to try to get to a process later on that takes a budget up that has a tax increase in it. One of the things we will hear pointed back to is the fact, well, you had one chance at a budget that had no increases, and now we have to consider this one where we are raising the taxes on the American people. In other words, our spending needs to be covered out of the wage earnings of the American people. I would guess that that is not something that is going to be very popular, but I would not be at all surprised to see it take place.

In large part, it is going to take place because the left wing majority of the Democratic Party still has not come to grips with the fact that we have got a spending problem in this Congress and in this country, and that is what has got to be handled.

They would still like to believe, their philosophy dictates, that what you have to do is get more tax money, get more revenues, grab more money from the American people in order to pay the bill for their spending habits around here.

I would say also about the President's budget that we are going to take up tomorrow that at least the President's budget is based upon a philosophy that works. The budget that we are going to ultimately get from the Democrats, maybe, is based upon a philosophy that simply does not work.

Why would I say the President's budget is based upon a philosophy that works?

First of all, supply-side economics has worked. I hear a lot of people coming to this floor talking about the failures of supply-side economics.

I would like to review some of the so-called failures that the left wing tells us about, because I would suggest it is a success story to have inflation down. I would submit that bringing down inflation rates from the double-digit rates that they were at the end of the Carter era to the present 3.5 percent is in fact a fairly major economic success story. I would also submit that bringing unemployment down has been a major success story of supply-side economics; and bringing interest rates down to where they are at the present time has also been a major supply-side success story.

Beyond that, you take a look at some of the other things that are happening in the American economy that are helping some of those big issues take place. If you take, for instance, the fact that the gasoline prices have dropped. A lot of people in this body and politicians around the country are saying, well, you know, that is just one of those things that happened. It really has nothing to do with Ronald Reagan's economics.

Well, that just does not hold water. Ronald Reagan took a risk early in his administration by totally deregulating the price of gasoline. At that time, many of the leftwing Democrats in this body came to this floor and said that the result of that was going to be massive increases in gasoline prices, that we were going to have $2 a gallon gasoline before you could blink your eyes, that we were going to see the energy crisis in this country shoot out of sight, that Reagan was being irresponsible. The fact is that what happened was that deregulated price caused, first of all, the supply problems to go away; but second, it also caused the kind of competition within the marketplace that ultimately leveled off the price and began to move it downward. Today in some sections of the country we have gasoline selling at less than 60 cents a gallon.

I would submit that the President's policies have had a great deal to do with that. The courage to deregulate early did in fact have an effect.

This economic growth within the stock market, investors have confidence in the economy. People putting up risk capital are taking those kinds of risks at the present time because they have confidence in the long-term growth of the economy. That stock market increase is allowing, then, many of those firms to have additional value against which they can borrow and thereby improve productivity, and so on. It is the kind of success story that this administration has helped sketch.

You also have the average family benefiting from all of this. Those lower interest rates translate not just to the fact that a family can buy a few new consumer goods or can buy a new car; what they are really able to purchase now that they were not able to purchase for most of the era of the Democrats' malaise is a new home. Today, literally, real estate agencies and lending agencies for home purchases are being swamped with people who want to purchase a home. That is a major success story for the economy because it means that new homes are going to be built, it means that there are going to be a lot of things happening in this economy, growth will take-place because people have the kind of interest rate situation, the kind of in-pocket money as a result of being back on the job, that they can go out and purchase a home.

I suggest that, then, the President's budget is based upon the kind of philosophy that brought us that economic good news and that that kind of economic good news at least is something which can be shown to work. And what we know now is that all of this does not just happen in a vacuum, that you do not just have a lot of good things happening because they just happen to take place. Not at all.

If you are going to do, as many of my colleagues in this body are so apt to do, blame the President for all that goes wrong in the country, we also ought to take a look and figure out some of the things that are going right in the country are as a result of the policies that he has pushed for and has had the courage to stand for against odds on many occasions.

The Democrats, on the other hand, have consistently been wrong about what they have told us as we have put many of those programs into place.

I remember back a few years ago when we were debating the famous Gramm-Latta budget bill. That was in 1981 and we have heard a lot about it. The majority leader of this House comes to the floor often and talks about the terrible Gramm-Latta budget bill and all the things that went wrong.

Well, I remember, also, what they were saying at that time. They were saying that if we passed that bill, literally, it would rip the country apart, that we would not be able to fund Government, that we would not be able to do all of these various things. And the fact is that we survived it quite well, that the country is better off having done some of the cutting that we mandated in 1981, and that much of what the Democrats have done since that time is try to restore a lot of the spending that we took out in 1981 that in fact proved so helpful. They have been exacerbating the problems that we face with regard to the deficit.

I also would point out that when we passed the President's tax bill there was Democrat after Democrat after Democrat who came to this floor suggesting that the passage of a tax-cut bill of the type that we were about to take up was going to bring about major doses of inflation in this economy, that we were going to experience massive double-digit inflation as a result of that economic judgment.

The fact is that inflation has dropped steadily since that time, that we now have an inflation situation far better than it was during the Carter years and that we have seen an economic success story develop as a result of that tax bill, the economic growth that is now taking place.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOODY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was not in Congress at that time, but I remember the debate being, starting with GEORGE BUSH, that this was voodoo economics, that a tax cut of that dimension would probably throw us into a big deficit, you could not increase military spending the way the President wants, cut taxes, and balance the budget. All three promises were incompatible with one another. And, insofar as yielding this unprecedented prosperity, we saw a tremendous recession of near depression magnitudes in parts of the country in 1981 and 1982. We came out of it beautifully, and that is to the credit of all concerned.

I think Mr. Paul Volcker deserves a lot of credit for breaking the back of inflation, although it was at a terrible price.

At the time, I might add, the White House was complaining and supply-side economists who argued exactly for the tax cut were complaining that Mr. Volcker was being far too tight with money and he was wrecking the whole thing. His answer was, "We are bringing inflation down. That is my first responsibility."

Insofar as this unprecedented prosperity, you know we are going to have to pay for these deficits at a future date. We are flying now and paying later. So I am not so sure the final word is in yet on just how prosperous this Nation is.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will allow me to reclaim my time, the gentleman will admit that we have had one of the longest sustained recoveries since the end of World War II.

Mr. MOODY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. WALKER. That in fact has has to have something to do with the economic policies that we have followed.

And I would also submit to the gentleman that the recession began—the gentleman is an economist, he knows that we track these things—before any of the Reagan economic policies went into place in 1981; that as you track the recession, the recession begin in July of 1981. Virtually everybody agrees with that. There was not one element of the Reagan economic program that was in place. The recession in 1981 and 1982 was in large part the hangover effects from the mismanaged economy during the latter part of the Carter years. And I think that we need to be somewhat realistic in taking a look at the real figures.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. Yes; I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY. I thank the gentleman.

I do not dispute the gentleman's point that the seeds of the 1981 recession and the ingredients were certainly present in the last days of the Carter administration, and no one is standing here extolling the management of the Carter economic policies. I think they were flawed in some important ways. There is a natural business cycle, and the recession of 1981 was due to a lot of things, but it was made far, far worse—and I think you only have to consult some of the supply-siders on this matter—by the fact of the Federal Reserve policies of extremely tight money, which were made necessary by the tremendous fiscal stimulus and adrenalin that was being poured into the economy at that time.

Bear in mind that we have stimulated the economy to the tune of $900 billion in deficit spending, almost $1 trillion, since this administration came in office. To counter that, to maintain some kind of balance, you have got to step on the monetary brakes, and they were stepped on hard, and interest rates went up, up, up, the real interest rates were very high, higher than under Carter, and that did stifle investment, that did create unemployment, and we had unemployment up to 11 percent in many parts of the country.

Mr. WALKER. Well, let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. MOODY. So it is not just Carter's policies.

Mr. WALKER. I think the gentleman makes a point, but he is historically wrong in terms of the overheating of the economy. When the 25-percent tax reduction went into place, it went into place, the first few months of it, during the first year at a 5-percent rate. The first 5 percent was upfront. We did not get the full 25 percent of the tax cut until we were well into 1983. Those of us who were supply-siders, the real supply-siders, wanted those tax cuts upfront so that we would not plunge the Nation into that kind of a recession. But this House decided in its wisdom to first of all not have a 30-percent reduction but to have a 25-percent reduction and front-load it in a way that the lesser cuts came at the beginning of the period.

I would submit to the gentleman that if we had had the full tax cut, if we had a full 10-percent tax cut in the first year, we might have avoided the depths of that recession, and that that was indeed the mistake that was made; but once we cut in the full impact of the tax reduction, we have seen the sustained period of economic growth since those days and that that is in large part the result of the policies we pursued.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY. I thank the gentleman very much, and I appreciate his courtesy.

I would not dispute that. I think there probably were people, and I am sure, from what the gentleman says, that he was one of them, who has argued that we should have gone much deeper in our tax cuts in 1981. I suspect that would have caused a more serious deficit than we had. We only had what? $184 billion, I guess it was, instead of $200 billion in the deficit. We probably would have been well over $200 billion if those policies had been followed, unless there would have been stimulus enough to bring the whole economy up, which might have been the case, but I will remind the gentleman that the Volcker philosophy was that we cannot have that much stimulus without countervailing monetary restraint.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is correct except that he seems to ignore the fact that the tax cuts did not bring less revenue to the Federal Government, they brought more revenue to the Federal Government. As a result of economic growth, we have growth revenues into the Federal Government at rates of $60 to $70 billion a year.

We are seeing economic growth produce additional revenues to the Federal Government.

I am constantly amazed at the economic analyses by many people in this body that suggest that all of the losses by the tax-cut bill would have taken place because we would have had the same amount of economic growth. Had we maintained the Carter administration tax rates from 1981 through 1985, this country would still be in a recession because this economy could not sustain those kinds of tax rates. That is what we found out.

Mr. MOODY. Could I respond?

Mr. WALKER. And it seems to me that it is somewhat disingenuous to suggest that we would have had the same amount of economic growth and so that therefore we have lost tax revenues as a result of the reduction in the tax rate. I would suggest that we have gained a great deal of tax revenue as a result of the tax rate.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY. I appreciate the gentleman's courtesy. It is most kind of him to allow me to participate.

We did not generate more revenue by virtue of those tax cuts. That is not a correct statement. We generated more revenue historically, but the whole economy tends to generate more revenue as you go along, for obvious reasons, growth reasons. The revenues that we now have are lower than they would be had the Carter policies been in place, by most mainstream economic analysis. No one can prove that, I would quite readily agree, because we cannot run a controlled experiment, but the numbers that the CBO indicates and others indicate is that we would have quite a bit more revenue had we had the old pre-Reagan tax policies in place.

Mr. WALKER. Let me just ask the gentleman, when he makes that statement, is that based on the same rates of economic growth?

Mr. MOODY. No, no; they make adjustments for that. But it is not true to say that we have more revenues as a result of the tax cut. That is not a correct statement. We have less revenues as a result of the tax cut. If you look at the CBO analysis—and the CBO is not a Democratic organization, it is not a Republican organization; it is a respected nonpartisan or bipartisan organization that happens to be run by a respected Republican economist at this time, Rudy Penner, for whom we all have a great deal of respect——

Mr. WALKER. Who makes static analyses of budgets.

Mr. MOODY. Well, they do their best, rolling in what they think are reasonable assumptions about dynamic analysis. But be that as it may——

Mr. WALKER. But, largely, it is a CBO analysis, and one of the great problems I have as a supply-sider is that we are stuck in most of what we do around here with static analyses.

Mr. MOODY. That is always a problem. But, anyway, the numbers are this: If you take the 1981 tax cuts, without the restoration of the taxes that happened in 1984, 1982 and 1984, you have $850 billion in revenue cuts over 5 years. That is an average of over $170 billion a year.

If you look at the 1985 numbers alone, they are as follows: You start with a deficit under Carter policies of about $74 billion, you add $169 billion in revenue loss as a result of the 1981 tax cuts, then you subtract $53 billion in taxes that were put back over the intervening period, and you still come out with a huge loss.

Now, military spending went up about $38 billion, domestic spending went down about $35 billion. It is almost a wash. The big item that has enlarged so rapidly the deficit—and, of course, the interest costs have compounded it—has been in fact the 1981 tax cut, assuming some sort of dynamic analysis. No one can be positive to the dollar, but that in fact, I say to my friend from Pennsylvania, is the rough magnitude of the numbers.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I would say to the gentleman that we as a result of the tax cuts are still collecting—well, let me say, parenthetically here, I assume that the gentleman, then, is suggesting that under the Carter administration policies and the Carter tax rates we would have continued to take a larger and larger percentage of the GNP in Federal taxes because the only way that the gentleman can be correct is if we had moved up the amount of taxes being taken out of the economy by the Federal Government, because at the present time we are at precisely the historic level of revenues that we have been at for the last 20 years in terms of intake to the Federal Government. We have been taking in somewhere in the vicinity of 18½ percent to 19½ percent of gross national product for a period of 20 years in Federal taxes. That is right precisely where we are at the present time. We are right at about 19.3 percent at the present time of revenues coming into the Federal Government as compared to GNP.

The problem is, I would say to the gentleman, that in the period of time of which we are speaking, the spending of the Federal Government has moved from a 20-percent level up to a 25-percent level.

Mr. MOODY. Under this President it has gone up. It has gone up under this President.

Mr. WALKER. No.

Mr. MOODY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. WALKER. Well, it has gone up under this President but because of this Congress. We have overspent——

Mr. MOODY. We have spent less than he has asked us to spend.

Mr. WALKER. Let me say to the gentleman that one of the things I am doing here this evening is, I have got a total analysis here that the gentleman might want to look through, because what this shows is that compared to our first budget resolution in each of the years from 1981 to 1985, we overspent our own budgets over that period of time by a total of $160 billion. We are the spenders.

Mr. MOODY. We have spent less than the President has asked for in 4 out of the 5 years.

Mr. WALKER. That is based on, again, this crazy business that we have got around here of analyzing the President—the only way you come up with that analysis is that you analyze in all of the supplementals the President has been forced to ask for as a result of our appropriations process in this body, where we underfund programs purposely in order to hold spending levels up. The Food Stamp Program, for example, I will say to the gentleman, over the last several years what we have done is, we have funded it at the level the President asked for in his original budget but only for 9 months.

And then we come back in later on with a supplemental. In the area of agriculture over that 5-year period, as a result of that kind of phony economics, we have overspent our own first budget resolutions in the area of agriculture by $45 billion.

Mr. MOODY. The gentleman is correct, but I will still stick by the statement. In the end, if you add it all up and net it out, the gentleman is correct about food stamps; we have come back again for supplementals. But the total aggregate numbers are still lower than the President asked for. The budget deficit itself has been lower than the President's request.

The President has requested a bigger deficit than we have ended up passing for most of the years. Those are the facts.

Mr. WALKER. But we are responsible for spending the money. If you want to pass it off to the President, go ahead and pass it off to the President, but ultimately we are responsible in this body for spending, and the point that I am making to the gentleman——

Mr. MOODY. We are asking for truth in numbering here.

Mr. WALKER. But the point I am making with the gentleman is that we have committed ourselves to certain things around here. We have committed ourselves in first budget resolutions to certain levels of spending since 1981. We have said in those first budget resolutions, this is going to be the level of spending. That is the promise by this House. Invariably, we have gone over that amount.

Mr. MOODY. We have still been under what the President has asked for in 4 out of 5 years.

Mr. WALKER. But the President is not responsible for our spending. I will tell the gentleman that most of the reason why you are over is because you are adding in the supplementals. That is the only reason.

Mr. MOODY. We are still spending less than the President has asked for. Do not say that he is providing leadership on spending constraint; he is not.

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman our budgets have consistently been higher than the budget the President asked for. We have consistently——

Mr. MOODY. That is not true; we have spent less than the President has asked for in 4 out of 5 years.

Mr. WALKER. These figures certainly would not show that we are a small spending body.

Mr. MOODY. We are a big spending body.

Mr. WALKER. It shows that our pledges on the budget are just absolutely inane. We now have a study done by the Republican Study Committee that shows that last year's budget, which I do not know whether the gentleman voted for or not, whether he voted for the fiscal 1986 budget or not, where we were promised by the majority on the Budget Committee that we were going to get $56.2 billion in deficit reduction. Well, the figures are now in. The CBO that the gentleman refers to has now told us that the total amount that we have gotten in savings in that deficit is a total of $4 billion.

We were promised $56.2 and we got $4 billion.

Mr. MOODY. You are shifting the argument.

You are talking about spending levels, and spending levels are lower in Congress than they have been proposed by the executive branch in 4 out of the 5 years.

The fund numbers you raised——

Mr. WALKER. What the gentleman wants to do is take spending levels that result from a lot of supplementals as two.

Mr. MOODY. The whole thing. And they are still less than the President has asked for.

Mr. WALKER. But you do not want to deal with the fact that the reason why the President has to come up here and ask for supplementals is because we passed phony appropriations to begin with. It is not just in food stamps. It is in CCC; it is in program after program after program.

Mr. MOODY. If we had passed the whole thing we would still be under; we did it in stages which is the wrong way to do it.

Mr. WALKER. But there I would tell the gentleman that I think he is wrong. That if in fact we had stuck with the original numbers, and the President would not have to have asked for supplementals, that the President would have asked for less money than we ended up spending.

Mr. MOODY. Why did the President ask for supplementals because he himself recognized that more money was, at least he felt and recommended to us that more money is needed. The bare fact is this: The President has asked for more spending in 4 out of 5 years than Congress has granted. The President has asked for bigger budget deficits than Congress has granted. They are still way too big, and there I side with the gentleman. We need to bring them down and I side with the gentleman as well and say the buck stops here. We cannot blame the President.

What I object to is pretending that this President has asked for lower spending; he is not. The percentage of GNP under this President has gone up in terms of Government spending. Of course, the mix that he would like is different than the mix we want. We have not given as much military as he wants. We have given him more civilian than he wants. But the total level of spending is higher than it was under the previous President.

As for taxes, a very important error was made a few months ago I think is worth pointing out. At least I feel it is an error, with all due respect. The level of taxation of our society, yes, it is not 19 as you slipped into. You were right when you said it is about 18 something. It historically has been 18; that is correct. But there is a very important fact that one overlooks and one gives that gross figure. A larger and larger and larger percentage of that figure, of those taxes are in fact user fees and contribution payments for Social Security, Medicare, et cetera. A smaller and smaller and smaller fraction of that 18 percent is general revenues. Of course, corporate taxation has dropped dramatically as you well know. It is now a very minor segment of the total tax take.

What has really grown under that 4 to 18 percent has been the entitlement payments, that is the revenues from the withholding of payroll taxes.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman still agrees with me though it is 19.3 percent at the present time.

Mr. MOODY. It is under 19; it is under 19 the last I looked. That is not my main point. My main point is this: The Social Security taxes are now running greatly ahead of Social Security payments. The Social Security System is running a huge surplus.

The President is not asking us to pay taxes to cover the regular part of Government. The general revenues are not nearly covering the general operations of the Government. If we took out Social Security taxes and we took out Social Security payments, we would be in a much bigger deficit. That is really a new phenomenon. That is a very serious phenomenon, I think, and that is why if you set aside Social Security payments and Social Security taxes, we are now running a huge imbalance which I think cannot be sustained and should not be sustained. We need to build those surpluses up because we have got a huge baby boom that is going to be retiring in the year 2010 and to blink at that is a very serious error.

To not agree with what you are saying, we have drastically cut the percentage of our GNP which we use to fund general government. Under this administration that percentage, taking aside Social Security, has been drastically cut. It is now in the 14-percent range.

Mr. WALKER. I go back to what I said before, the gentleman's program then is to raise the amount of revenue taking out of this economy by the Federal Government to a level far higher than the historic performance. That is the gentleman's program. He may explain it as being money paying into trust funds, and whatever, but the fact is that you are really suggesting that we need to have an economic philosophy that we ought to take 20 percent or more out of the economy in terms of revenues.

This gentleman believes that that is disastrous; that is precisely the direction the Carter administration was heading and it plunged us into economic disaster and that we have a far better chance of achieving what we want to do if you have real economic growth as a result of low tax rates.

Mr. MOODY. First of all, that is not what would plunge us into recession. My point is that if we are going to run the level of government at $1 trillion then we should pay, or if we are going to run general government, some minor Social Security trust funding at $800 million a year, then I think we should run taxes to cover it. I do not believe in borrowing those kind of magnitudes. Whatever Government level of spending we set, we should raise enough money to cover it. Not borrow the way we are doing now. We are borrowing $150 billion a year from foreigners to cover this imbalance which is going to have to be financed in the future out of our children's standard of living because it is going to have to be paid back with interest not to Americans but to Germans and Japanese and others.

My philosophy is not that we should raise taxes; my philosophy is that whatever we decide to spend, the way to finance it is to pay-as-you-go revenues, not borrowing.

I would join the gentleman in cutting government. So I am not saying that we have to raise taxes. But I would either reduce government or raise taxes, but I would not tolerate deficits.

Mr. WALKER. The performance of this House, I would say to the gentleman, is not to cut the spending.

Mr. MOODY. This administration is not to cut the spending.

Mr. WALKER. I am concerned about the job that the American people have elected me to do. And the job the American people have elected me to do is to come to this body and try to do what we can here to end the spending machine. In fact, what we saw what we were doing, is adding to the spending problem, not reducing it.

Mr. MOODY. I agree with the gentleman. We are held accountable, hopefully, for what we do, not for what the President proposes; there we agree. But I would say when you want to lay the blame, it takes leadership from the White House. The only person who is elected to represent the whole country is the President. If you and I say our districts will take disproportionately large cuts to help the deficit, that would have much of an impact. I would be willing to do that. The point is, it has got to come from the White House. But to not admit in the well of the House that the White House has proposed more spending than we have granted, I think perhaps some of the people are watching the program.

Mr. WALKER. Well, what I have said to the gentleman is the only way we can come to that figure is to use the supplementals which we, in fact, have basically mandated with the kind of irresponsible appropriating that we have largely done.

Let me also say to the gentleman that the administration has now shown leadership. They have sent up the Hill a budget that is $143.6 billion and it is therefore within the Gramm-Rudman targets.

Mr. MOODY. That is right. I applaud him meeting those targets. That is leadership. We have not seen that kind of restraint in the last 5 years.

Mr. WALKER. But it has been done. I would say to the gentleman that one of the things I began here complaining about is the fact that tomorrow we are going to run that budget out here on the House floor. My guess is that it is purely a political tactic because it is being brought out here without any kind of analysis for the changes in the economy that have taken place since it was written and so on and so forth, and it is also being brought out here without any alternative being offered by the gentleman's side of the aisle. We are going to have no Democratic budget out here on the floor tomorrow whatsoever. We are simply going to have this exercise of running through the President's budget.

I would suggest to the gentleman that leadership is a two-way street, that if we are going to have that kind of performance, then the gentleman's party, that leadership, the Speaker of this House, have an obligation to come forward with their own plan and not just come out here being totally negative, kicking around the President's plan, which I assume is the only thing we are going to hear tomorrow.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY. Well, I think the gentleman makes a good point. I think if we were ending Congress tomorrow, that would be a very good point; but we will have a chance to have alternatives. There will be Democratic alternatives and I hope Republican alternatives that will be fashioned in committee and elsewhere brought to this floor so that we can vote, but it does not all have to happen tomorrow.

Mr. WALKER. But why have this vote? Maybe the gentleman can explain to me, why have this vote in isolation tomorrow if we are going to go through the whole process? Why not move the process forward by having the President's budget considered as a part of the process, rather than this rather cynical political ploy that this House is going to parade through here tomorrow.

Mr. MOODY. Well, I will try to respond. I am not in the leadership, so I cannot answer for the leadership, and I do not think it is proper or even in accordance with the rules of the House, but the gentleman is probably the best exponent of this body in following, to impugn the motives of the leadership of either side in why they bring something out. To call something a cynical political ploy I think violates the dignity of the assumption that everyone is operating with the best of motives.

Mr. WALKER. Can the gentleman ascribe some other motive to it?

Mr. MOODY. Yes. I think there is in fact a very legitimate case for taking a reading, a thermometer reading, if you will, on the President's budget tomorrow, or at some early date so we know just how much support there is. It may pass. I do not think it is going to and the gentleman does not think it is going to, but it at least should have an opportunity to pass. If it does not pass, we go to the drawing boards. We know that that is not the blueprint that the Republican or the Democratic side subscribes to and we have got to come up with something different.

I think it is appropriate to have that as a part, and it is in fact a part of the process. The process is not a 1-day process. It is a multiday process.

Mr. WALKER. Can the gentleman name me any other time in the last 12 years of the budget process when we have had this temperature reading used?

Mr. MOODY. I think that is the problem with this body. There are too many people saying that it has not been done before. I do not think that is an argument why it should not be done now. I think we are too tradition bound in some ways. I think the President deserves the budget vote tomorrow or any other day soon so that we can get a reading. I do not think it is a cynical political ploy.

Listen, I hope the gentleman will vote for it. I assume he will from his comments, because the gentleman says it comes under Gramm-Rudman and to the gentleman and to me that is a very important point.

Mr. WALKER. I intend to vote tomorrow "present." I intend to vote "P" and I will tell the gentleman why I am going to vote "P" for "protest," because I think it shows the ultimate sickness of this House to have this kind of thing paraded before us as somehow a reality in budgeting.

This is not a real exercise tomorrow. Everybody knows it is not a real exercise tomorrow and the fact that we would go through it is simply an attempt either to embarrass the President, or as I suggested earlier in my talk, perhaps to throw out, if possible, the budget that is up here without tax increases in it so that we can get around to discussing a budget later on that includes tax increases, because there have been an awful lot of people down here suggesting that the grand strategy for the future has to include a tax increase.

Mr. MOODY. Let me respond.

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY. First of all, no less a personage than the Budget Director, James Miller, has asked for a vote, an early vote on this budget, so it is not as though we have concocted the idea of a vote, the Democrats.

I think there are people within the administration that want to vote, James Miller is, of course, the chief spokesman in this area. He wants a vote. He should be getting it.

They do not agree with that you said this is not a real budget. They say this is a serious budget, a real budget. If it were a phony budget, I think the gentleman would have a point, but they say it is not a phony budget. It is a real budget. Therefore, it deserves a vote.

Mr. WALKER. I did not say a vote was phony.

Mr. MOODY. I do not plan to dishonor my franchise in this body by trivializing the President's budget by simply voting "present" tomorrow and calling the whole thing a sham. The President's budget is a serious matter.

Mr. WALKER. The President's budget is not a sham. The President's budget is a real budget that meets the Gramm-Rudman targets.

Mr. MOODY. And it should be voted on.

Mr. WALKER. There is no budget on the gentleman's side of the aisle that comes anywhere close. We do not even have any language on the gentleman's side of the aisle and what we are protesting is the sham of a process that we are going through here, because we all know that the President's budget could be included as part of a budget package so that people could have a look and look at the various alternatives. This way there will be no alternative and I would suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. MOODY. If the President wants an up or down vote on Contra aid, what is wrong with an up or down vote on something like that? Then you can go on to compromises after that.

This is an up or down vote on the President's budget. He has asked for this budget. He is the most important budget player here in town. This is the leading document in town at the present time. The Democrats do not yet have an alternative. You cannot though criticize them for having no alternative and say they should have one in time by tomorrow morning.

Mr. WALKER. I would respectfully suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman ought to reread the Constitution, that the President is not the most important budget player in this town. We are. We are the most important budget players in this town by the Constitution.

Mr. MOODY. Who submits the budget first? The President.

Mr. WALKER. We do not have a prime minister form of government. We do not have a parliamentary form of government. We by the Constitution are given the responsibility of doing the budgeting in this particular system of government, beginning it, and the President can send a suggestion up here. That is what he has done. He has provided us with a working document.

Mr. MOODY. That is a very artificial reading of the process. The American people know what the President does.

Mr. WALKER. It is not an artificial reading, it is a constitutional reading.

Mr. MOODY. No. The President submits the budget first. He does that traditionally.

The gentleman invoked tradition a few minutes ago, saying when has this happened before. Presidents traditionally send the budget to Congress way before Congress is ready to even conceive what the budget should look like and that becomes the document from which we work.

If the gentleman would like to see them side by side simultaneously, I suggest there may be a chance to do that. If the gentleman is willing to vote tomorrow on it, the gentleman may find that it may come back. In fact, I would suggest that if it fails tomorrow or if enough people vote "P" that you boycott the election tomorrow, the vote, then perhaps the gentleman should ask that the rules be made in order that the President's budget may come back when we finally do have a democratic alternative. I hope we have it swiftly. We should have the President's budget side by side when we have a democratic alternative.

Mr. WALKER. If that is the gentleman's point, then why in the world could we not get a rule to offer an additional budget out here tomorrow? The Rules Committee is going to send a rule out here tomorrow, a closed rule so that only the President's budget can be offered.

Mr. MOODY. That is tomorrow. Next week or next month we can have another one.

Mr. WALKER. I realize that. So why, if that is the gentleman's point, why go through this cynical charade tomorrow, because it strikes me that is a completely useless exercise to go through and that is the reason why we are going to get a lot of votes "P" for protest tomorrow again because it is a totally unreal exercise, set up for purely political ends, I would say to the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY. I think the gentleman is out of order. I think it is against the rules of the House to impugn the motives of the leadership of either side.

Mr. WALKER. Does the gentleman wish to have any words taken down?

Mr. MOODY. No. I am just giving the gentleman my opinion.

Mr. WALKER. I the gentleman feels I am out of order, I would say to the gentleman that I know the rules a little bit and I do not think there is anything in the rules that suggest that I cannot call an action by people in here a political ploy.

Mr. MOODY. A cynical political ploy.

Mr. WALKER. A cynical political ploy, and I think that is totally within the rules of the House to suggest that something that is going on in this House is in fact just that.

Mr. MOODY. I think that demeans the dignity of this House. This is a serious vote tomorrow and if the gentleman intends to trivialize it, that is his privilege.

Mr. WALKER. I do not intend to trivialize it beyond the fact that it has been trivialized by the gentleman's party in bringing the bill to the floor in the way that they are bringing it.

First of all, the chairman of the committee told me today that the bill was introduced at the request of the administration. When I checked with the administration, they told me that is not the case.

Right away it has been trivialized, so we do not have a real budget out here that has been introduced at the request of the administration.

Mr. MOODY. That is a very sterile point. We know they submitted a budget. I have a big stack of blue books in my office that is from the administration.

Mr. WALKER. And it is a working document.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Miller told me this is a very serious proposal. We do not trivialize his proposal. They want a vote on it. Mr. Miller has asked for a vote on it.

Mr. WALKER. I agree.

Mr. MOODY. He did not say at the same time as the Democratic alternative. We will have a chance to vote on the President's proposal and Democratic alternatives. They do not have to be done simultaneously. If the gentleman votes no tomorrow or yes tomorrow, the gentleman will have a chance to vote again on the Democratic proposal.

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman that what we have done is we have taken what has traditionally been a working document and we have brought about a process here which I have got to tell the gentleman in the opinion of many of us who serve on the minority side are entitled to an opinion, too, is a process that stinks.

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am very glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ARMEY. I appreciate that. This has been a very fascinating discussion. There are so many points I would like to make. I would like to make a couple points.

First of all, even if we go back to Laffer's work, he cites President Kennedy, who would now be in the most conservative wing of the Democratic Party if he were here today, as having conducted this experiment of lowering taxes and increasing tax revenues. At that time Kennedy was considered a genius for his creativity.

I want to make just kind of a run through of history. We were doing all right until President Johnson gave his famous "guns and butter" speech in 1966 and said that we could have our war on poverty and our war in Vietnam at the same time without raising taxes to pay it and then took William McChesney Martin down to Texas for a barbecue when Martin tried to have a tight money policy to combat inflation. That is when inflation took off in America and we never got it under control, quite frankly, until Chairman Volcker came along and did something that the Federal Reserve had not done.

If you take that period of time, their idea of tight money was to raise interest rates. Well, the interest rate is the most high linkage price in America. When you raise the price of credit, you increase the cost of doing business both on the producing and on the buying side. You have a double-barreled dose of inflation coming into the economy.

In fact, I can remember Milton Friedman's famous editorial which he entitled, "The Inflationary Fed" that said that you cannot fight inflation by raising the price of the most pervasive commodity and exchange in the economy, the price of credit.

Now, what Paul Volcker did was switched from a high interest policy for the first time in years to a tight money policy. Paul Volcker basically taught the Federal Reserve how to operate a tight money policy and indeed it did have an impact and it did work.

I want to go back to "voodoo economics." I can forgive GEORGE, the Vice President, for the comments on voodoo economics. The only experience he had to relate to was the experience of Lyndon Johnson's famous guns and butter speech, and that was voodoo economics. He did not know the extent to which this Presidential candidate had a new idea and a better idea, an idea that did involve lowering the marginal tax rates to begin with, providing the incentives and indeed the desire on the part of our President at that time to have reductions in expenditures on the domestic side in order to close that window of vulnerability by restoring our Nation's defense on the other side.

If you talk to the Vice President today I think you will find an unqualified friend of Ronald Reagan. His loyalty to the President and his understanding of what the President is doing is not something we could have expected necessarily at that time, reflecting back on the Johnson experience.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will let me reclaim my time just for a moment, my guess is that the Vice President might think at the present time that the promise to the American people of a $56.2 billion deficit reduction in the budget and then to produce only $4 billion in deficit reduction might be the true case of voodoo economics at the present time.

Mr. ARMEY. Well, I appreciate that.

I would like to go back to one point, the most interesting part of the discussion is why all of a sudden in a case that I have never seen before is the President's budget recommendation taken seriously by the House and even brought directly to the floor for a vote? I am going to suggest another explanation.

Mr. WALKER. Other than a cynical political ploy?

Mr. ARMEY. No, no, other than that. Gramm-Rudman. I remember the debate, somebody stood in the well and raised their hands in despair and said that Gramm-Rudman will change the way we do business in the House.

□ 2150

That is one of the reasons I voted for it.

But if you take a look at what has happened, we now have to meet the limits on borrowing with Gramm-Rudman, and we have to also have a budget that we have to live with. This House never had that before.

Now it is very likely that the majority of the members on the Budget Committee do not know how to do that, do not know how to get that restrained budget without borrowing, or without taxing, do not know how to get past cutting spending, and quite frankly, they may be so bewildered by the requirement that they must cut spending that they cannot raise taxes or they cannot increase borrowing, so totally bewildered about that that the only course of action that they can conceive to do is to take the President's budget and his leadership to the floor and have an up or down vote on it, on a consideration of that to learn something from the process so that indeed in the unhappy event that the President's budget may fail to pass tomorrow, they may have learned something in the process that will help to learn how to cope with the requirement imposed on this body by the American people. Yes, we have got to cut spending, cut down on borrowing. And no, the American people will not tolerate a tax increase as long as we have these wasteful spendings, trying to sustain that Great Society Program begun in the Johnson administration, sustained all these years despite the fact that the American people today so clearly see those policies have been abject failures, have done nothing but aggrieved the problems that they were originally designed to help alleviate.

Mr. WALKER. Let me say to the gentleman that there is some evidence for his thesis, because the fact is that if you take the budget that this House passed last year, the budget brought forth by the Budget Committee last year that promised $56.2 billion in deficit reduction, I said that it has actually produced $4 billion. The only way that it did that was because we got $12 billion in Gramm-Rudman cuts. If it had not been for the $12 billion of Gramm-Rudman cuts, last year's budget that was supposed to save $56.2 billion would have actually increased the deficit by $8 billion.

Mr. ARMEY. I remember that well. In fact, it was watching that budget process last July, almost a year ago, that gave this new Member of Congress the clear and unqualified understanding that at least at that time the budget process in this House was nothing but politics, had nothing to do with policy and would, indeed, result in that disaster. That is what is so great about Gramm-Rudman. It does two things. It defines a limit somewhere in the fiscal triad that this House stands on: Spending, taxing, and borrowing. It finally defines a limit someplace that this House must face.

Incidentally, the second point is that it says to this House you had better learn how to make a budget and live within the budget you make. We have never had to do that before.

Mr. WALKER. That is an important point because last year, despite all of the promises on the House floor about the fact that we were doing something real about deficit reduction, the fact is it was all smoke and mirrors.

Mr. ARMEY. Absolutely.

Mr. WALKER. It was gamesmanship. There was nothing real there. The only real savings came in the Gramm-Rudman process that we are now taking credit for. But even with the Gramm-Rudman $12 billion savings, our budget process last year has saved us a total, from the CBO baseline of $4 billion, which means that we are missing billions, tens of billions of dollars of promised savings. The only reason why those funds could be missing is because they were not real in the first place. It was all smoke and mirrors. We were not going to either make this savings, or we were not going to get the revenues, or something was going to go wrong and we have a report here of some of the things that went wrong.

But the bottom line is that that was not a real process. My suspicion is, my suspicion is we are going then through one more gamesmanship by running the President's budget out here, because we have not yet found a way in this body to do the real things that are required under Gramm-Rudman. So what they are going to do is they are going to try, if they can, to undermine the President's effort to do something real with Gramm-Rudman, come in and meet the target, try to undermine that so that when they bring their product to the floor at some point in the future, hopefully, it will get hopefully more sympathetic consideration simply because we have already turned down the President's attempt.

But the fact is that it is likely to be a collection of smoke and mirrors also.

For instance, I hear now one of the things they are looking at is the tax amnesty program. I do not see anything wrong with maybe looking at the tax amnesty as one way to get some additional revenues. But I have been told there are people saying that they are going to add $20 billion of additional revenue to a budget coming from tax amnesty. Everybody knows that that would simply be so much smoke and it would be meaningless. Some people are saying it may be worth $2 or $3 billion. OK. Fine. Maybe we can find that. But certainly not some of the figures that are now being tossed around.

So my guess is that there is an attempt to first of all justify some smoke and mirrors in the future, and second to raise taxes in the future.

Mr. ARMEY. Unhappily, as a new Member of this body learning the way this body operates, I cannot argue with the gentleman's guess or his suspicion, or however you want to characterize it. I find it somewhat discouraging that the only more encouraging thesis that I might offer for this tactic is that they simply do not know what to do with their loss, they do not know how to deal with the rigors of Gramm-Rudman. Those are the only two theses that I could quite understand.

Mr. WALKER. But the disturbing thing about that is that one of the ways that they are hoping to get the monkey off their back that they have done nothing on the budget is to run the President's budget out here so that they can all say, oh, we have done something, we ran the President's budget out here and it failed, without taking the responsibility of leadership, of producing a budget of their own. That is part of the reason why I am disturbed too. It is my guess that part of the attempt here is to justify the fact that really we are not doing anything around here. We have gone weeks without doing very much in the House of Representatives toward legislating for the Nation's future, and certainly we have not done very much in the budget. My guess is that if we got a rule tomorrow and we defeated the previous question and allowed the chairman of the Budget Committee to present his own budget out here on the floor tomorrow, my guess is that he could not produce that budget. My guess is that there is no such document that he could produce on the floor tomorrow.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MRAZEK] if he would like me to.

Mr. MRAZEK. I must confess that like some of my other colleagues, the gentleman speaks so quickly at times that it is hard to keep up, and I am not sure whether we are here debating Gramm-Rudman, as my colleague from Texas is such a strong advocate for, and which I voted for, and which I voted for with terrible misgivings. But based upon the fact that I did not see the kind of joint partnership between the President of the United States and the U.S. Senate, which is, as you know, controlled by the Republican Party, the other body, and this House of Representatives, which is controlled by my party. That kind of bipartisanship which could lead to making the very difficult decisions to close this deficit is not being evidenced by the debate that I have heard since I have been here tonight. I have heard a lot of partisanship here tonight.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will allow me to reclaim my time, does the gentleman regard it as an exercise in bipartisanship to bring the President's budget to the floor tomorrow? Does not the gentleman think perhaps there is a tinge of partisanship by his party in conducting the budget process in that way?

Mr. MRAZEK. If I might respond to the gentleman, I might suggest there is a lot of hypocrisy that takes place in this town. But just the fact that this hypocrisy takes place does not mean one has to add to it with debates like this. I mean, the President of the United States cannot stand on the steps of this Capitol and say he is for a budget that is balanced, that he is for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget, and then continue to submit year after year budgets that are not only in deficit, but are in deficit by some of the largest figures in the history of this United States of America.

My only point is he is not solely to blame for what has taken place. And I know there are people in my own party who would suggest that by dramatically increasing defense expenditures to meet projected ostensibly credible threats that this is a necessary expenditure for the United States of America, and that it is also important to the growth of our economy to lower tax rates. But you cannot take credit for the good things that happen in this economy and at the same time ignore the fact that some of the decisions made by this administration have, in fact, increased the deficit just as President Johnson dramatically increased the deficit when he suggested we can afford both guns and butter back in the 1960's.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman would let me reclaim my time just for a moment, the President cannot do any of those things on his own. The President cannot spend one dime that we have not approved. So if in fact the President of the United States has requested those levels, we could have very easily suggested to the President that we were not willing to spend at those levels and send him down budgets, and he could not spend one dime.

The fact is that what we are hearing right now is the President is sitting down there, deferring some money, and we are hearing screams of bloody murder, largely from liberal Democrats, about the fact that some of these deferrals are taking place and they think it is illegal; they have even threatened to go to court and try to get the President to spend the money.

Mr. MRAZEK. I think it is important that everybody play by the same rule book. What concerns me is that the President presents a budget to this Congress. Now, are we supposed to assume that that budget is just a charade, a worthless document? Or a working paper?

Mr. WALKER. No, a working document.

Mr. MRAZEK. Well, when it turns out to be a working paper that underestimates defense revenues by $15.9 billion according to the Congressional Budget Office, according to Senator PETE DOMENICI of the other body, the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, according to the chairman of our Budget Committee, I am suggesting to you that perhaps we are not playing by the same rule book.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will allow me to reclaim my time again, then why is the leadership of the gentleman's party bringing that budget to the floor tomorow with precisely those figures in it? If those figures are as wrong as the gentleman says, and there is general agreement that those figures are wrong, why is it coming to the floor tomorrow with those figures in it precisely the same?

NICARAGUAN COMMUNISTS SKILLFULLY CONFUSE THE AMERICAN PUBLIC

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, there is substantial confusion amongst the American people about what is happening in Nicaragua and why. We are faced, next week on March 19 with a vote of historic proportions, and yet the American people remain confused.

I would like to shed some light on this debate by first telling the American people and my colleagues what the people of Central America think about Nicaragua.

In a poll published in the La Nacion newspaper in San Jose, Costa Rica, representing results of inquiries made during March 2 and 3, this was the outcome:

In Costa Rica—the oldest democracy in Central and South America—93 percent of the people perceive Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union. Now they are closer. If you can see the map of Central America, Costa Rica sits due south of Nicaragua, and they have a very good idea, a very good knowledge about what is happening in that country; a very good idea how it impacts them, because indeed the gift from Nicaragua to this oldest democracy in Central and South America, Costa Rica, has been the training of Costa Rican Communist guerrillas to subvert this oldest democracy in Central and South America and therefore it is rather natural that the people of Costa Rica would be concerned.

When the people of Costa Rica see the largest army in the history of the region bristling with Soviet weapons and supercharged by Cuban military advisers, it is only natural that they would perceive Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union.

The situation is not different in Honduras, which borders Nicaragua on the north. The opinion in Honduras of that poll taken during the days March 2 and 3 was also 93 percent viewed Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union.

The opinion in Guatemala was some 80 percent viewing Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union. Now, Guatemala is one country removed on the other side, the north side of Honduras. They do not share a direct border with Nicaragua, but still 80 percent of the people perceive Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union.

The poll was also taken in the city of San Salvador, and 74 percent of the population in San Salvador felt that Nicaragua was an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union.

Why then is there such rampant confusion amongst the people of the United States when the neighboring countries are so convinced of the threat of Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union?

I suppose we are much further removed from the threat, and perhaps have a greater luxury of being confused, but I think part of it is the very sophisticated methods by which the Communist government in Nicaragua has set out to fool the people of the United States of America.

There is an interesting document that has been produced, and it relates to a defector from the Ministry of Interior—which is a pseudonym in Communist countries for the secret police—a Mr. Baldizon, who has testified extensively before groups in Washington, DC, committees, intelligence committees, and the like.

Mr. Baldizon talks about deceiving visiting international delegations on page 11 of this State Department-produced document.

Let me just quote:

As part of its international political strategy, the Sandinista government seeks to use foreign visitors and religious groups as instruments of support for its public posture that the FSLN—that's the Sandinista party, the communist party—and the Nicaraguan government respect religion and human rights. How else could the Catholic Conference of Bishops deny the pleas and the entreaties of the Cardinal, Obando Y Bravo, the Cardinal of Nicaragua? And take a stand against the kind of action that would bring religious freedom for Catholics in Nicaragua?

Baldizon said that "The Sandinista Government carefully orchestrates such visits whenever possible in order to obtain the greatest propaganda value." Many of the visiting delegations are organized by Nicaraguan solidarity groups in the United States and Western Europe. These group tours of Nicaragua are often prepared in conjunction with Sandinista organizations to show only what the Sandinistas want to be seen.

In many cases, the members of such groups are told by the organizers that they have an obligation when they return to their countries to speak out on the "Nicaraguan reality" that they have experienced. In truth, what they have experienced and seen is merely a carefully prepared facade which masks the real situation in Nicaragua.

This goes back a long way. In the beginning of the Soviet revolutionary era, they used to fix up the facade of villages, paint them, fix up the windows, fix up the streets; and these were called "potempkin" villages.

We have potempkin villages in Nicaragua today. These group tours of Nicaragua composed of American church groups and well-meaning religious organizations in the United States are being deceived by the Sandinista government.

Baldizon explained that when the Nicaraguan Government learns that a foreign delegation wants to visit certain areas in the country, government "officials are sent out to prepare the way. People who appear on" the government's "list of 'potential enemies' receive visits by the officials and are told to stay away from the visiting delegation. Some 'potential enemies' are locked up during the visit as a warning to others of what could happen to them if they do not cooperate.

"Security agents pretending to be photographers, journalists, or relatives to the people in the region to be visited frequently join the delegations to accompany them on their trips. In this way, the" government "can monitor the attitudes of the groups' members and subtly steer them to particular places or people.

"They report to the Ministry on groups' travel itinerary, using advanced notice of the group's travel plans.

"The Interior Minister, Tomas Borge, sends teams of people to be on the routes used and in the localities to be visited. They are called casual encounter teams. And when a delegation arrives at a location, government personnel, pretending to be local residents, just happen to be available to talk with the delegation's members. They describe alleged contra atrocities and the benefits of the Sandinistas revolution for Nicaruagua's peasants and workers."

I submit that this is a significant feature of the landscape of confusion in the United States today.

Unlike the Costa Rican public opinion, Costa Rica being on the southern border of Nicaragua, or unlike the Honduran public opinion—and by the way, both Honduras as well as Costa Rica is a democratic government, freely elected, democratic government. In both of those democracies, 93 percent of the people perceive Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union.

I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MRAZEK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am curious as to the source of those polls, because needless to say in a democracy the key poll is an election.

Mr. RITTER. Yes.

Mr. MRAZEK. We have a new President in Costa Rica, we have a President in our Contadora ally in Colombia, we have a new President in an emerging democracy in Guatemala, President Cerezo.

In all three cases none of the Presidents of these emerging democracies of Costa Rica, Guatemala, and Colombia, not one of those Presidents agree with the policies of the Sandinista government in Nicaragua. Yet if I might just add one further point, not one of those Presidents agrees with the policies of this administration in its support of the Contras. And in fact every single one of those Presidents in recent weeks has spoken out against the $100 million commitment to the Contra forces.

Mr. RITTER. I think the gentleman makes an extremely important point and that is that these governments in spite of the fact that their people feel the way they do, that these governments fear the Sandinista Communists greatly.

I traveled in that region on an Intelligence Committee trip with a member of the Democratic side, and a liberal Democrat to boot, and not a proponent at that time of the President's policies. In each of the countries that we visited we talked with the Presidents at that time. Each of those Presidents told us, and I will not mention names because I do not want to embarrass them and their Foreign Ministers, told us, and their political leaders told us, that they fear deeply what is going on in Nicaragua, that they support the idea of pressure, including military pressure, on the Sandinistas but publicly they fear going out on a limb that is wide, that is thin, that is very extended, that can break off at any time. Why? The gentleman raises such an interesting point because it gets back to my next point, and that is that the policy of this Government because of this Congress has been, in the words of Alfonso Rubello, a former member of the Sandinista junta, a social democrat if there ever was one, in the mold of European social democrats, quite liberal by American standards, former president of the Central American University in Managua, Nicaragua, in his words these leaders cannot take a position, they cannot take a position up front because the United States policy of yo-yo, on again, off again, can leave these leaders and leave their populations naked and exposed to an aggressor the likes of which the Central American region has never seen in terms of armaments, in terms of size of army, in terms of ideology, in terms of repression.

They are frightened and they are fearful of going out on this limb because they are afraid that this Congress, not this administration, because they know where the administration stands, but this Congress, and in large measure the Democratic Party in this Congress, will saw off that limb and they will fall. While they are on their backs, they will be consumed by the realities of power in Central America and that is Communist Nicaragua acting as agent for the Soviet Union.

I yield to the gentleman briefly.

Mr. MRAZEK. I fully appreciate the fact that oftentimes my majority party in this House controls the time. By the same token I like to think that in this body there is a sharing of ideas and perhaps I have interrupted an important soliloquy in terms of a presentation that you would like to make to the American people. And if that is the case, I certainly do not want to intrude on that soliloquy.

Mr. RITTER. I appreciate the views of the gentleman, his comments, and I am willing to yield. I hope the gentleman can get on with his contribution.

Mr. MRAZEK. It is curious to me that for example a new President of Costa Rica who could meet in his office with a gentleman named John McLaughlin from the American press, who I do not think is perceived as an exceedingly liberal man by peace groups, for example in the United States of America, that John McLaughlin would meet with the new President of Costa Rica for a 90-minute or 2-hour interview which has been taped and in which the President of Costa Rica very candidly tries to express his views as to why he believes the Reagan administration's posture with support of the Contras against the Sandinistas is counterproductive to the goals that we all share, that we all share as Americans who want to see stable democracies in Central and South America, counterproductive because in fact the Contras do not have indigenous support amongst the people of Nicaragua.

Mr. RITTER. I accept the gentleman's point. I reclaim my time.

The gentleman makes another very interesting assertion, and that assertion is that these leaders in Central America today—and again I was in Central America in July and there was another President, but the people who were running for President were at that same meeting and each one of them took us aside and said, "Look, whatever you do, do it with strength, do it with force, don't tarry, don't yo-yo, don't go back and forth. Make up your mind and act."

Mr. MRAZEK. You are saying that the present President of Costa Rica is a hypocrite who told you one thing and——

Mr. RITTER. Excuse me, I control the time.

In meeting with the reporter from the American media, believe me, if I was a Central American President and I was exposed to the vagaries and vicissitudes of the U.S. House of Representatives and I was exposed to the yo-yo of American policy in the region, I would be very cautious as to how I presented my case but in a way I agree with the gentleman because when we were down there the public postures were all of that ilk. But the private statements, the going aside, these statements are all in support of a strong American position.

□ 2020

Why? Because the alternative to a strong American position is dominance by Communist power, by Soviet power and the militarization of the region.

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would submit to the gentleman that a strong America does not have to be a military commitment.

Mr. RITTER. I will recognize the gentleman at the appropriate time.

Mr. MRAZEK. Thank you.

Mr. RITTER. The gentleman can get his own special order.

Mr. MRAZEK. No. I thank my colleague.

Mr. RITTER. The same people who were viewing Nicaragua as an agent of Cuba and the Soviet Union also in this opinion poll viewed Nicaragua as a grave military threat.

In Costa Rica, 92 percent of the people named Nicaragua as a military threat; in Honduras, 89 percent of the people; in El Salvador, 63 percent of the people, that have got their own military threat at home; in Guatemala, once removed with its own liberation struggle off in the hills, 48 percent.

But I think that the key thing is that the two bordering countries of Costa Rica and Honduras view Nicaragua as a military threat. That is really what the vote we take next week is all about. It is about the militarization of Nicaragua by Cuba and the Soviet Union, and the threat that it poses to the region and, yes, eventually to the United States.

The same people who see Nicaragua as a military threat, Costa Rica, Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador; 4 percent of Costa Rica views the United States as a military threat, 2 percent of Honduras views the United States as a military threat, and 5 percent of Guatemala.

Let me go back.

Mr. MRAZEK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RITTER. Maybe the gentleman does not like La Nacion's poll.

Mr. MRAZEK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RITTER. I want to give some results from a Harris poll taken in November which essentially solidifies the feelings of these people, and perhaps the gentleman would believe more strongly the Lewis-Harris work with Central America. But I yield at this point to the gentleman.

Mr. MRAZEK. I would submit that, needless to say, a lot of Americans have read polls and they can be useful in their place. I do not think anyone in this body is disagreeing with the fact that we want to see a different type of government than the Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

The question is, what approach that we can take is going to bring about that kind of fundamental change toward a stable democracy, toward a government that has benign and not seeking to perhaps disrupt the internal workings of another nation.

Mr. RITTER. The gentleman qualifies the use of the word "disrupt." Is that purposeful? When the gentleman says perhaps disrupt, does the gentleman really mean disrupt, or is perhaps—is the gentleman not sure? I would like to quote chapter and verse from some good examples of disruption. I just have that question for the gentleman.

Mr. MRAZEK. I try to choose my words very carefully. What I tried to suggest was that we all as Americans want to see a stable democracy. The question is, if we spend $100 million supporting the Contras, or we spent $400 million supporting the Contras, or we spend $1 billion supporting the Contras, is it in fact going to bring about a stable democracy in Nicaragua?

Mr. RITTER. The gentleman has asked——

Mr. MRAZEK. And I would like to try to respond to that question without having to refer to a poll.

Mr. RITTER. Let me go on, because it is my time, and then I will yield back to the gentleman.

That is the question. What will $100 million or $200 million do?

First of all, $100 million——

Mr. MRAZEK. Could help a lot of farmers.

Mr. RITTER. $100 million is not new funds. It is reprogrammed funds from foreign assistance programs or from defense programs.

Mr. MRAZEK. Farm support programs or mass transit.

Mr. RITTER; No; I am sorry. From foreign assistance programs, security assistance programs or defense programs. That is where the funds will be reprogrammed from.

Now, $100 million amounts to about six fighter aircraft.

Mr. MRAZEK. That is a lot of money, is it not?

Mr. RITTER. Excuse me. It is a very small percentage of our defense allocation.

Now, what can we get for this very small percentage of our defense spending?

There are 20,000 to 25,000 Contras. This is no mercenary army. They are volunteers. They are Nicaraguan people who are fighting to regain their country, and at the present time they are very poorly armed against the Soviet-Cuban supplied massive armed force.

But one of the things we could get out of this $100 milion, perhaps to the tune of $5 million, is weaponry to neutralize the Sandinista helicopter attack force. The Sandinistas currently maintain a large number of MI-8 troop-carrying helicopters, and lately, as we understand it, two fleets, perhaps as many as 24 of the MI-24 Hind helicopter gunships, the most effective counterinsurgency weapon in the world today. We have nothing like it. This is the weapon that is killing people in Afghanistan and it is now killing people in Nicaragua.

But with the proper defensive weaponry against these instruments of war, which incidentally cost on the order of, we estimate, $12 or $13 million apiece, for maybe $5 million we can get antiaircraft, antihelicopter weaponry to neutralize that. So we are getting something to do something against that Sandinista army.

That could be very effective. That money could be extraordinarily effective.

Mr. MRAZEK. That $100 million might save a few farmers in this Nation, too.

Mr. RITTER. Again, I am saying let us not build 3 fighter planes, let us not build 10 tanks; let us do this, because it is far, far more important.

Mr. MRAZEK. That is the problem I think of this Congress. All too often we want to spend money in foreign countries that we could better spend here in the United States.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to yield to the gentleman, but I refuse to have the gentleman continue interrupting me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the time.

Mr. RITTER. I will yield.

Mr. MRAZEK. When?

Mr. RITTER. Twenty thousand Contras are equivalent to some 1.5 million Americans up in arms against the Federal Government of the United States of America. Just picture the kind of mass revolt that would be existing, let us say confined to the border areas of Texas and Canada. But 1.5 million Americans taking up arms against the Federal Government, that is a large number, all volunteers, unpaid. I mean this Contra force is not a small force considering the size of Nicaragua. And I have just pointed out how a limited amount of portable antiaircraft weapons could do a great deal of damage to the Sandinista air force.

Mr. MRAZEK. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. RITTER. The gentleman is asking what does $100 million do. I think that is a very important question.

The Sandinistas have tanks. They have armored personnel carriers. They have 154 tanks. Do you know how many tanks there are in El Salvador? Three. Do you know how many tanks there are in Costa Rica? Zero.

Now, with a few million dollars worth of the latest technology and wire-guided or similar antitank weapons, we could neutralize a tank force. The Sandinistas are loaded with—these are all Soviet tanks, obviously, Soviet armored personnel carriers and Soviet trucks. The right kinds of assault weapons can be very, very effective.

The bottom line is, that force of 20,000 is going begging while the Sandinista army is supersaturated with Soviet weapons.

Mr. MRAZEK. Will the gentleman yield for 30 seconds?

Mr. RITTER. They could not conceivably absorb any more.

Mr. MRAZEK. Will the gentleman yield for 30 seconds?

Mr. RITTER. The fact is that $100 million has a very significant impact on the conflict. Most experts say it takes a 10-to-1 ratio in order to neutralize the guerrilla force. The Sandinistas, the Nicaraguan Communists, would have to draft practically every person of draft age in the entire country to get that kind of ratio.

Mr. MRAZEK. Will the gentleman yield for 30 seconds?

Mr. RITTER. So what I am saying to my colleague, and I think it is a very excellent point that the gentleman made, that $100 million, that reprogrammed money from 6 fighter planes or 3 fighter planes and 14 tanks could make one heck of a difference in bringing some kind of pressure on the Sandinista Communists.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MRAZEK. We are talking about a $100 million figure, 100 million U.S. tax dollars, at a time when farmers are killing themselves, when they are killing their families, when disabled veterans are killing their families and themselves.

□ 2230

And you are suggesting that $100 million sent to 15,000 to 20,000 mercenaries, most of them copping out in Costa Rica or Honduras——

Mr. RITTER. They are not mercenaries. That is absolutely not true. These people are not mercenaries. Most of them are peasants.

Mr. MRAZEK. We created the Contras.

Mr. RITTER. Excuse me.

Mr. MRAZEK. We created the Contras, we sponsor the Contras, we pay for the Contras. I think it is our responsibility as the American Government to give them their severance pay and to try to get them back into Nicaragua peacefully.

Mr. RITTER. If the gentleman will yield back, I must correct his misstatements.

I do not know what you are talking about. You better check the facts. The facts are that these people are fighting to regain their country.

Now, I urge you, as some of your colleagues have done, some who have voted against assistance, some who are on the very liberal side of the spectrum, I urge you to talk to them—and I will name names after I talk—to talk to them and ask them——

Mr. MRAZEK. My distinguished colleague does not provide me time to respond to the points that he makes.

Mr. RITTER. I will provide you time. But I would hope that you would not make misstatements.

Mr. MRAZEK. If you do not have time tonight, then perhaps we could debate it next week. But I do not have any opportunity, truly, to respond to your points without your interrupting or immediately reclaiming your time as soon as you feel that I have made some significant point here.

Mr. RITTER. I would like to mention to the gentleman that is my time, and I appreciate his interaction in this debate.

Mr. MRAZEK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. RITTER. But if there is a misstatement I think it is incumbent to correct that misstatement.

The Contras are fighting to regain their country from a bunch of thugs, gangsters, Communists and Soviet and Cuban agents. Now, that is the bottom line. Now, if you do not characterize it that way, I would like you to please describe to me how you characterize that leadership in Managua today.

Mr. MRAZEK. I would submit to you that just because there are bad guys and the President calls the Sandinista government bad guys, just because there are bad buys in Nicaragua does not mean that according to some pristine symmetry of history there are automatically good guys.

The unfortunate problem here is that we are supporting people who neither have indigenous support within Nicaragua—and, in fact, I just met with a gentleman, Col. Edward King, who came back from Central America within the last 2 weeks, who suggested that if you want to quantify the makeup of the Contras right now, approximately a quarter to a third of the Contra fighting forces hiding out in Honduras and Costa Rica could be represented by people who have a genuine grievance against the Sandinista government. In other words, people who are reasonably motivated to fight to regain their country. Then you have a significant element of people who have been coerced or kidnapped into going with the Contras. You have a component of people who were of draft age. They did not want to be drafted by the Sandinistas, and they ended up going across the border into Honduras and Costa Rica and are in refugee camps in close proximity to the Contras and are claimed by the Contras. But the bottom line is that you have a poorly trained force that right now says they cannot go back into Nicaragua because they do not have boots and they cannot find boots. I do not know if they have to be accountered by L.L. Bean in order to get the proper equipment that they need to go back into Nicaragua to fight for their homeland, but I am submitting to you that I see a lot of similarities between the ARVIN—and I am talking now about the South Vietnamese Army that my generation was asked to volunteer and fight to support because they were part of a fledgling little democracy in South Vietnam, fighting against Communist subversion and terrorism, and my generation and I volunteered——

Mr. RITTER. I would like to respond to some of these comments.

Mr. MRAZEK. If I could have 1 minute more, I will finish my point.

Mr. RITTER. I would like to reclaim my time because the gentleman has made some statements which are positively outrageous.

Mr. MRAZEK. How about 1 more minute so that I can make a few more statements, and then you can come back.

Mr. RITTER. If you will stick around, I will give you another minute.

Mr. MRAZEK. I ask for 1 more minute.

Mr. RITTER. All right, 1 more minute.

Mr. MRAZEK. I thank my distinguished colleague. I deeply appreciate it. I know how sincerely you feel about this position. But I must suggest to you than we went through a terrible experience. And I know the President calls it a noble war, but it was an experience in which my generation of Americans were asked to fight a fledgling democracy, and we had 55,000 Americans dead, 500,000 wounded, we spent several hundred billion dollars there, we sowed the country with agent orange, we admitted to killing 3 million Vietnamese, and when we pulled out, that country collapsed like the rotten house of cards that it always was.

Mr. RITTER. All right, the gentleman has had his time. I will now reclaim my time.

Mr. MRAZEK. That was a pretty fast minute. That was like the 10 count for Sonny Liston.

Mr. RITTER. I would like to comment on just a few of these absolutely outrageous statements.

Vietnam today is a slave state. The gentleman seems to be thinking somehow that we are responsible for Vietnam being a communized slave society, a society where 500,000 people fled to the South China Sea, where 100,000 people drowned in Southeast Asia, where up to 3 million Cambodians were killed in the greatest genocide the world has known since the Holocaust. And somehow this other side, according to the gentleman, does not come in for any blame. It is the United States, we are responsible. This is the blame-America-first attitude. Jeane Kirkpatrick talks about it.

Mr. MRAZEK. I take great exception to that. I do not blame America. I volunteered to serve my country at that time, and I am sure the gentleman might have had a very good reason——

Mr. RITTER. If the gentleman will please follow the rules of the House. The gentleman seems to think that somehow the United States was responsible for communism and repression and terror.

Mr. MRAZEK. Do not put words in my mouth, please.

Mr. RITTER. Well, I would like to hear you say that the North Vietnamese and their Soviet allies behaved criminally in that conflict, in that denouncement after the conflict. I would like to hear somebody from your side get up and do a special order once on Cambodia and the genocide that the Communists brought to Cambodia. But I want to get back to Nicaragua.

Mr. MRAZEK. That was not the North Vietnamese.

Mr. RITTER. I want to get back to the Contras. The Contras——

Mr. MRAZEK. Like the South Vietnamese soldiers.

Mr. RITTER. Are fighting to regain their nation. The Contras do not like communism.

Mr. MRAZEK. Do we have to do their fighting for them?

Mr. RITTER. They do not like—excuse me?

Mr. MRAZEK. Do we have to do their fighting for them?

Mr. RITTER. We do not. And that is again the bottom line.

Mr. MRAZEK. Why are they in Honduras and Costa Rica?

Mr. RITTER. Why should the United States be forced into a position later on? Why should the United States not support those fighting for freedom to regain their country?

Let me tell you about Contra leadership. I mention Alfonso Robelo. I wish you would sit down and talk to him once. I wish you would talk to one of the Sandinista junta, one of the three top people, Arturo Cruz. I wish you would talk to him, a democrat if there ever was one, small "d." The same is true with Alphonso Robelo, Adolpho Calero, a businessman, a democrat, with a small "d," imprisoned by Somoza. These are the leadership of the Contras. They have a well-defined program for the country to enter into democracy and pluralism, essentially living up to the demands acceded to in words only by the Sandinistas in order to get the Organization of American States support prior to their grabbing power.

Yes, these are democrats, the people who are fighting to regain Nicaragua for Nicaraguans as opposed to Cubans, as opposed to Soviets, as opposed to Bulgarians, as opposed to Libyans, as opposed to East Germans, as opposed to Vietnamese and North Koreans. Because that is who is running Nicaragua today. The gentleman knows it. It is all in our intelligence reports.

Mr. MRAZEK. Why are they hiding out in Honduras and in Costa Rica?

Mr. RITTER. The interesting thing about our policy there is that it has been a yoyo policy.

Now, here is what happened, here is the reality of what happened: We cut off assistance to the Contras. The Contras were making some very substantial gains.

In June of 1984, we cut off military assistance. We cut off all assistance. We even cut off advice. We have an intelligence capability there, and that intelligence capability was not even allowed by law to advise the Contras when the Sandinistas were coming after them or when there were major movements of Sandinista troops. That cutoff lasted from June of 1984 to September of 1985. That was 16 months. In that 16 months of no American involvement in the military effort, in that 16 months of intense negotiations with the Sandinistas, what was going on inside Nicaragua? Civil and human rights were further removed, Economic rights were further removed. The Sandinista army continued a precipitous, sharp buildup supplied by the Cubans and the Soviets, and in November of 1984, which is 5 months after the United States aid was cut off by the Boland amendment they took delivery of the first MI-24 Hind D helicopters, the most effective counterinsurgency weapon in the world today, the first.

Now, this was our repayment for this Congress, at least, going on record—not this gentleman, but I am sure that gentleman, and many of his colleagues, most of his colleagues indeed—that was the repayment that we got for hamstringing this administration for cutting off its policy at the knees for 16 months. We got increased militarization of Nicaragua by the Communists, increased repression, increased movement to a totalitarian rule, increased press censorship. That was the time of negotiations. We had dozens of meetings, both with the Contadora group and the direct negotiations between us and the Sandinistas.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RITTER. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman from New York asked a specific question, and I think maybe the answer to his question is that there are members of the democratic resistance in Nicaragua that are in Costa Rica and Honduras for the same reason that there are freedom fighters in Afghanistan in Pakistan. The fact is that if you are fighting a guerrilla movement, you basically need safe places to go to.

The gentleman I think has told us that he fought in Vietnam. I was in the military during the Vietnam era. I was not there. But in talking to many of my generation who——

Mr. MRAZEK. I did not say I fought in Vietnam. I said I volunteered for the service at the time and was in military service, as the gentleman was.

Mr. WALKER. Yes. I, too, served during that time, and I remember talking to my friends at that time who were in Vietnam. One of the most frustrating things in Vietnam was the fact that the Vietcong kept escaping into Cambodia where we were not allowed to go. Guerrilla movements have tended to always have those kinds of safe havens as a part of their tactics, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania I think makes a very good point, one of the reasons why they have had to retreat to those safe havens right now is that they do not have any equipment to sustain their drive.

Mr. MRAZEK. Oh, please, let me have an opportunity to respond.

Mr. RITTER. What the gentleman is saying is true on both counts. But the fact is that they are very short of equipment.

So here is the bottom line——

Mr. MRAZEK. Is it possible for me to respond for even 15 seconds?

Mr. RITTER. I will let the gentleman respond.

The bottom line is that those fighting for democracy, those fighting to stop the Soviet-Cuban advance have been cut off by the Americans, and those fighting on behalf of the Soviets and the Cubans—and certainly these polls show, whether it is a local poll or Harris poll—that the people down there believe that the Nicaraguans are agents of the Soviets and Cubans, that those Nicaraguans are fully supported, armed to the teeth by the Soviets and the Cubans.

So you have a Soviet-Cuban proxy in the Sandinista Communists, armed to the teeth by them, fighting the democratic proxy which has had the rug pulled out, largely by this Congress, largely, I might add, by your own party.

So this is the imbalance that we face.

How can you withhold small amounts of support for those fighting for freedom when those who they are fighting against are receiving a vast—up to the billions—amount of dollars in hardware from the Soviet and Cuban Communists.

Mr. MRAZEK. Will the gentleman yield for 30 seconds?

Mr. RITTER. Do you perceive any threat whatsoever from a Soviet base and the full communization of Nicaragua? Do you see that as any problem whatsoever, given all the statements that the Sandinista director has made about exporting the revolution and being part of the world revolutionary movement and the justification of their existence being spreading international communism?

Mr. MRAZEK. It is a long question. Do I get a chance?

□ 2245

Mr. MRAZEK. Please, in the interest of fundamental truth, to begin with, do not confuse the Afghan freedom fighters with the Contras. The Afghan freedom fighters would fight with their bare hands against the Soviet invasion of their country. They are in their country, they are taking extraordinary casualties, they are fighting against nerve gas, they deserve our highest respect.

Do not compare the Afghan freedom fighters who are putting their lives and their families on the line to the Contras who are hiding in——

Mr. RITTER. I must respond to that. The gentleman in the well is probably the longest standing supporter in this House of the Afghan freedom fighters. I had organized an informal task group on Afghanistan long before the State Department had any involvement. Long before the committees of the Congress had any involvement.

Mr. MRAZEK. I applaud the gentleman when he is correct, and I must criticize the gentleman when he is incorrect. I applaud your support for the Afghan freedom fighters.

Mr. RITTER. There are very great cultural differences between Afghan freedom fighters and Nicaraguan freedom fighters. But this I will tell the gentleman being rather familiar, from personal experience in both places, with both groups, the Afghan freedom fighter does not conceive given his cultural background, of the types of social orders and democratic orders and pluralistic orders that the Nicaraguan freedom fighters perceive.

Mr. MRAZEK. Are we talking about people who are part of the national guard of Anastasio Somoza?

Mr. RITTER. You know, this is the biggest red herring I have ever heard. The amazing thing about this red herring is that there are probably more ex-Somocistas fighting with the Sandinista Communists, the more criminal elements fighting with the Sandinista Communists than there are fighting with the Contras. We have names, we have numbers and we can prove that.

This dragging out of the Somocistas, I would like to get one iota of consideration from the gentleman, whether he thinks that this Soviet-Cuban putsch, this communization of the Central American mainland, this construction of massive airfields and massive military training sites and all of this armor and all of these helicopters and all of this repression in this society, does the gentleman for a moment have any reservations about what is going on there?

Mr. MRAZEK. May I respond?

Mr. RITTER. Indeed.

Mr. MRAZEK. We are talking about a very poor country with a population of approximately 3 million people surrounded by a number of other nations that are emerging democracies. All of whom want to see the problem in Nicaragua resolved. Who want to see the Sandinista government brought under control, but who have a different approach than you do.

They share a common culture and a common language with Nicaragua. They think that it is possible to negotiate a solution in which there would be a removal of all foreign forces, all Cubans, all Soviets. That is what they say. These are our allies. This is what the President of Costa Rica says; this is what the President of Colombia says.

Mr. RITTER. They say more than that. The gentleman needs to yield on this point.

They say much more than that. Yes, they want foreign forces out. But they also want the kinds of changes taking place internally within Nicaragua that will insure safety, not tomorrow or in June or in September or 2 years from now, but will insure a kind of long-term safety because they do not trust the Communist government in Nicaragua. They know their leanings. They have read the materials; they have read the documents. They know their participation in this Soviet, Communist international movement. They feel that for safety's sake they need internal changes. Those are changes proposed in Contadora. Those are the elements of change that the Sandinistas themselves purported when they took power in a broad democratic front but have denied, all along have denied their own people.

Now, I guess it boils down to this: What makes the gentleman think that not having given an inch in this direction during 16 months of no U.S. military assistance, no U.S. advice, no U.S. humanitarian assistance, what makes the gentleman think that all of a sudden these hard-boiled Communists are going to all of a sudden get religion and adopt democracy or the trappings of a pluralistic, more open society when there is no pressure whatsoever to do so?

Mr. MRAZEK. Because if the gentleman will give me my 10 or 15 seconds you have been gracious to give me on occasion, I would simply suggest to you that the Contadora nations that surround Nicaragua right now do business with Nicaragua.

We have an embargo in Nicaragua, but none of our allies do, and the key to getting an agreement that we would accept, that Nicaragua would then either be in a position to accept or reject, would put them on the dime, so to speak. If they reject it, it would be encumbent on all of those allies that we have down there to quarantine Nicaragua, to economically and politically and socially quarantine Nicaragua and that would have an impact on that country. Undeniably it would have an impact on that country.

Mr. RITTER. I do not say undeniably. As a matter of fact, the impact could be quite minimal, Nicaragua's economy is more and more integrated with the east bloc economy, they are building massive Soviet-style courts and transit areas for importing goods from outside. I do not think it is at all essential. Nicaragua will survive, the people will be poverty stricken, communism will destroy their economy, but I can tell you this: The leadership will continue to live in the best houses, they will continue to have wild parties, they will continue to drive Mercedes.

Mr. MRAZEK. Are we talking about the Philippines or Nicaragua now?

Mr. RITTER. We are talking about Nicaragua. You know, it is interesting, the gentleman and his party, were all for intervening six ways to Sunday in the Philippines to bring democracy to that country so that stability could come to that region so that American security and East Asian security would be fulfilled.

I agree, but it is really kind of interesting that the gentleman and his party, when it comes to doing something about bringing democracy to Nicaragua, do not touch it with a 10-foot pole. I have not heard Members of the gentleman's party get up here in 1-minute speeches or special orders complaining about the lack of human rights in Nicaragua. Believe me, the lack of human rights in Nicaragua are far more substantial than the lack of human rights in the Philippines.

Mr. MRAZEK. But I have not heard the gentleman criticize the lack of human rights in Chile which needless to say are far more repressive than anything that is taking place in Nicaragua.

Mr. RITTER. Oh, the gentleman speaks totally out of line. Chile is free paradise compared to Nicaragua. I am not going to say good things about the Chilean military regime; no. I would like to see it shift toward democracy.

The interesting thing about it is in Latin America today, about 90 percent of the people are livng under democratic rule. What a marvelous victory for our way of life and our way of thinking. I think you can trace it back to Jimmy Carter's emphasis on human rights and Ronald Reagan's maintaining that emphasis, but maintaining a strong America so that these countries could move toward democracy, understand where the United States stood and not feel in a position to be destabilized and therefore, they could move into the high-risk area of free elections.

This is all taking place. What has happened in Nicaragua? The absolute opposite. By the way, all of these regimes were rightwing regimes, they were generally military regimes, military juntas, and they shifted and they changed. Franco's regime shifted and changed in Spain. The Greek colonels' regime shifted and changed in Greece. We have seen quite a few examples of the shift in change, but it has never happened, it has never happened from a Communist country. Never. N-e-v-e-r.

The only shift and change in a Communist government came because the United States moved into Grenada. That is the only situation of its kind since the Communist revolution in 1917. That is an amazing historical record.

I would like to just refer to some other views of the people of Central America as pointed out in a poll taken between June and November of 1985. It was done by a Costa Rican affiliate of the Gallup organization. In each country 800 persons were polled, they were a representative sample of adults with at least 1 year of secondary school. Independent opinion surveys are not permitted in Nicaragua so it was all the surrounding countries.

Central Americans generally hold that Salvadoran elections have been honest while those in Nicaragua are seen as having been dishonest. Nicaragua was named as the country trying most to weaken their own governments. That was the view of 70 percent in Costa Rica, 63 percent in Honduras, 52 percent in El Salvador. Nicaragua was identified as the country posing the greatest military threat to their own countries. That was the view of 87 percent in Costa Rica, 79 percent in Honduras, 56 percent in El Salvador.

Nicaragua was viewed as the country most likely to attack their own countries. That was the view of 64 percent in Costa Rica, 67 percent in Honduras. Three-fourths of those interviewed in Costa Rica favor United States aid to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance forces, while that policy is supported by a 2-to-1 margin in the other countries.

The majority also approved United States military aid to El Salvador and United States military presence in the region is seen favorably.

The United States was identified overwhelmingly as the country helping these countries to defend themselves. That was the view of 84 percent of the people in Costa Rica, 97 percent of the people in Honduras and 84 percent of the people in El Salvador.

Mr. MRAZEK. If the gentleman will yield long enough, I would like to thank him for allowing me to participate in this debate tonight. That is all I wanted to say.

Mr. RITTER. Well, I appreciate the gentleman's comments, but again, before the gentleman leaves, I would like one inkling of his concern that what has happened in Nicaragua, the Soviet-Cuban military buildup, all the intelligence that we have, the building of major port facilities, the air fields, all of the subversion of their neighbors, the involvement of the Nicaraguans in the M-19 attack on the Palace of Justice in Bogota, the tracing of the weapons to the Sandinistas, the ceremony that took place with Thomas Borge himself, the Interior Minister there, at a memorial to the M-19 guerrillas who were killed when the Colombians moved back in. Is there one inkling from the gentleman that something has gone radically wrong there and this Communist enterprise poses some sort of threat to the region and to the hemisphere?

Mr. MRAZEK. Let me just respond to the gentleman by saying I am deeply concerned about the impact and influence of both Cuba and the Soviet Union through its shipment of weapons, crude as they might be, to the Nicaraguan Government.

Mr. RITTER. The MI-24, the gentleman makes his statement——

Mr. MRAZEK. If I might simply say, they have not shipped Migs, they have not shipped nuclear weapons to my knowledge to Nicaragua.

Mr. RITTER. They do not need Migs, they really do not. They are solidifying, consolidating their own Communist revolution. They are dealing in the fringes at their borders.

The MI-24 helicopter gunship, the Hind-D, is the most sophisticated counterinsurgency weapon in the world today and the gentleman is saying, crude as they may be, these weapons, certainly it is just wrong.

The MI-24's two fleets of MI-24's could dominate the entire region of Central America. They have a range to extend well beyond their own borders.

Mr. MRAZEK. We are spending hundreds of millions of dollars deploying up to 15,000 troops at a time in exercises in Honduras, well-equipped American troops. We are training the forces of many of our Central American neighbors.

Mr. RITTER. Does the gentleman disagree with that?

Mr. MRAZEK. No; I do not, but I am submitting to the gentleman that it is not necessary to exaggerate the threat to the American people when in fact our allies down there who have asked for our assistance when they need it say that this particular policy of supporting the Contras is a mistake. It is a mistake in terms of the joint commitment we have to try to build a stable democracy in that country and throughout that region.

I can only suggest in conclusion that I share the gentleman's concern over this kind of potential influence, but I submit that spending $100 million to support these individuals, the Contras, is a mistake. I think the American people agree it is a mistake, because fundamentally and deep down the American people know who is willing to commit themselves on their own behalf and fight for themselves and for their freedom and who needs the kind of crutch that our South Vietnamese partners needed awhile back in the seventies.

Mr. RITTER. I resent the gentleman comparing this situation with South Vietnam and I reclaim my time.

Mr. MRAZEK. I am sorry, because I certainly do not want to create any resentment with my colleague.

Mr. RITTER. Fighting for their freedom in Nicaragua, they are serious about reclaiming their country from a Communist dictatorship, which the gentleman and his party obviously thinks is not a threat or not a real significant problem. The gentleman talks about restoring democracy.

Listen, if the Contra armies had a miniscule fraction of what the Sandinista armies have, they could potentially take out the Sandinista government or put them in a position where they would have to negotiate.

Mr. MRAZEK. I thank the gentleman for offering me the time that he did.

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman for participating in the debate.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TORT LAW CRISIS

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, continuing in my effort to bring pertinent information on the tort law crisis to the attention of my colleagues, I trust they will find this March 10, 1986, Robert J. Samuelson article from Newsweek of interest.

[From Newsweek, Mar. 10, 1986]

THE LAWYERING OF AMERICA

(By Robert J. Samuelson)

We are now seeing the glimmers of a new legal crisis in America. It arises from the clamor over liability insurance and a vague unease that lawyers are exercising too much influence. The United States now has more lawyers (an estimated 675,000 of them in 1985) per capita than any other major nation. Since 1950, their numbers have grown twice as fast as the population. But our sense that lawyers are meddling too much sits awkwardly with the great American faith in law as a remedy for almost any ill. Or, as one book a few years ago put it, "Sue the B*st*rds."

The key to understanding this confusion—if not entirely dispelling it—is to grasp a basic truth. Lawyers and law firms are businesses, and their business is conflict. Creative lawyering often means exploiting or creating conflicts. Just as companies develop new products, so lawyers search for new legal theories on which to sue. Rights of action are lawyers' markets. But their economic self-interest—their legal innovations—may subvert their social usefulness. The civil-justice system's essential purpose is to resolve conflict, not to excite it.

It's often a pretense that lawyers represent other people's grievances rather than their own economic interests. There are thousands of cases where lawyers, not their supposed clients, are the main aggressors. In the early 1980s, for example, many new "high technology" companies sold stock to the public. Many of these admittedly speculative stocks subsequently collapsed. Now there are dozens of suits against these companies, their officers, accountants and insurance companies alleging that investors were mislead. But the suits have been brought by a few law firms on a contingency-fee basis. The lawyers—who typically take 30 percent or more of a settlement or damages—stand to win the most.

Of course, a rising tide of lawsuits is not the only reason for more lawyers. Greater government regulation, complicated tax rules and expanding international business have all contributed. But the growth of lawsuits also has a big multiplier effect. It requires defense lawyers and lawyers to advise people and companies how to avoid being sued. Consider the evidence of more litigation:

Since 1970, membership of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America has nearly tripled, to 60,000. (In the same period, all lawyers rose 90 percent). To belong, half a lawyer's work must be representing people in personal-injury cases.

The number of product-liability cases filed in federal courts has risen from 1,579 in 1975 to 10,745 in 1984. Although most cases are settled before trial, the volume of jury awards in product-liability and medical-malpractice suits roughly tripled between 1975 and 1984, says Jury Verdict Research Inc.

Since the mid-1970s, suits against officers and directors of public corporations—from shareholders, employees, customers and others—have more than doubled, according to The Wyatt Co., a Chicago actuarial firm. Many of these cases are contingency-fee cases.

To be fair, the liability-insurance mess—complaints from doctors, cities, counsulting engineers, day-care centers and others that insurance is too costly or unavailable—is not entirely the doing of lawyers. The insurance industry bears much of the blame. A few years ago companies lowered premiums to compete for business. They expected to earn lush profits by investing premium income at high interest rates. Declining interest rates wrecked that gamble and, combined with steep insurance losses, triggered premium increases and coverage cutbacks. But the insurers' blunder only mitigates the role of lawyers.

SIDE EFFECTS

If courts adopt expansive liability doctrines, then the costs—not just insurance—will be huge. The gravest danger is becoming a precautionary society. Unintended side effects are already emerging. The threat of suits has driven some drug companies from manufacturing vaccines; consulting engineers now refuse to work on hazardous sites for fear of suits. Companies are losing outside directors for lack of liability coverage. As attorney Peter Huber argues, courts deal poorly with the full social effects of products, like vaccines, whose public benefits overwhelm the risks. Courts see only mistakes. "Beneficiaries of risk-reducing products . . do not litigate," he writes.

Stating the problem is easier than solving it. Lawsuits are an important discipline on corporate and individual irresponsibility. They do compensate victims. There is no neat dividing line between too much or too little liability. But we can impose self-restraint on the legal system by treating lawyers for what they are—businesses. We need legal rules with proper economic incentives. In damage suits, the losing side should always pay the other side's legal fees. This would deter weak suits by reducing the pressure for expedient settlements that are less than the cost of litigation. And a losing defense would ultimately pay if its delays ran up the other side's costs.

These common-sense ideas strike many lawyers as radical. They aren't. One inevitable complaint is that having losers pay would make it tougher for people of modest means to bring legitimate cases to court. This is nonsense. The reality is that the contingency-fee lawyer is already financing these cases. Strong cases would be more attractive under this system, because—aside from the contingency fee—the lawyer would also recover costs. But weak cases would be less attractive (the losing contingency-fee lawyer would pay the other side's legal fees), and they should be. The system exists to settle conflicts, not to generate lawyer caseloads. In a subtle way, commercial interests of lawyers now corrupt the law.

So let the lawyers grumble. If the current insurance mess leads to any good, it will be renewed political interest in our legal system. And that is as it should be. To paraphrase an old cliché: law is sometimes too important to be left to lawyers.

THE FEDERAL RADIOACTIVE WASTE LIABILITY ACT OF 1986

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, today I am joining with my colleague, Representative SID MORRISON, to introduce the Federal Radioactive Waste Liability Act of 1986. This bill, which has the strong and enthusiastic support of Governor Gardner from Washington State, would help to mitigate a serious inequity caused by the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982, that the citizens of one or two States—the final repository States—will be asked to assume virtually all of the risks that will exist from the presence of the Nation's nuclear waste.

Spent nuclear fuel, which is the waste product of nuclear fuel rods, is expected to remain deadly for at least 10,000 years. An accidental release of radioactivity from spent fuel, or other types of radioactive waste, could be devastating. If it were a major release, it could cause a disaster of unprecedented magnitude.

The citizens of one State should not be asked to take both the waste and the risk—taking the waste is contribution enough. Our bill would ensure that the Nation as a whole would at least assume the financial risk. It would guarantee that any citizen injured by a nuclear accident involving radioactive waste owned by the Federal Government—whether that accident occurs during transportation, treatment, storage, or disposal—would be fully compensated for that injury.

Although our bill is offered as an amendment to the Price-Anderson Act, there would be no "cap" on liability as there currently is for accidents at nuclear powerplants. The liability "cap" that Price-Anderson applies to nuclear power accidents was established because Congress wanted to give impetus to the growth of a commercial nuclear industry, and limited liability for major accidents was deemed essential to that policy. On the other hand, in the case of nuclear waste, the only thing we are trying to achieve is its safe and permanent disposal. By assuming full liability for nuclear waste accidents, the Federal Government would not be discouraging a desired activity—it would be encouraging it.

Our bill establishes a two-tiered system of payment. The first $5 billion of liability arising from any single nuclear waste accident would come from the nuclear waste fund, a utility-financed source of payments. If the liability from a nuclear waste accident exceeds $5 billion, payments would be made directly by the Secretary of Energy, who would be required to borrow the money from the Treasury. This would ensure that persons who are injured by a nuclear waste accident would be fully compensated for their damages.

This bill builds on H.R. 2524, which Representative MORRISON of Washington introduced last May. In developing the bill we are introducing today, Representative MORRISON of Washington and I have incorporated the policies set forth in H.R. 2524, and we have expanded on them. Representative MORRISON has been a leader in this area, and I'm pleased to join him in working toward the goal of assuring full compensation by the Federal Government in the event of a nuclear waste accident.

Mr. Speaker, the bill which Representative MORRISON of Washington and I are introducing today would be a major step forward in establishing the credibility of the Federal Government's management of nuclear waste. It is our goal to enact this bill into law this year, and we ask for the support of our colleagues in that endeavor.

SERVICE-CONNECTED BENEFITS MUST BE PROTECTED FROM BUDGET CUTS

HON. G. V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I voted for Public Law 99-177, the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill, because I believe we must reduce the Federal deficit. I expressed my reservations about certain aspects of the proposal during many hours of debate on the measure. When certain beneficiaries were exempted from the automatic reductions required under the legislation, I was the first to take the floor to express my strong views about exemptions for certain veterans' programs. As my colleagues know, the House provided the leadership that eventually protected compensation for veterans disabled in service and dependency and indemnity compensation for eligible dependents. The House provided a measure of protection for our veterans' health care system. The measure that passed provides that in no event shall the medical care account be reduced more than 1 percent in the current fiscal year or 2 percent in any other fiscal year.

The budget-balancing legislation moved very swiftly through the Congress and the President was quick to sign the measure into law. Many of my colleagues pointed out that the legislation was not perfect; in fact, we knew there were many areas that would require adjustments based on each individual Member's priorities.

One flaw in the measure quickly surfaced as soon as the President's sequestration order was issued on February 1. The order set a VA home loan ceiling that, if not corrected, would have shut down the GI Home Loan Program by April 1 of this year. To its credit, the Congress acted quickly and veterans are now assured that they can take advantage of the low interest rates to get into a home for the first time or refinance their loans and save thousands of dollars over the mortgage period. The correction we made with the enactment of H.R. 4130 (Public Law 99-255), was good for veterans, the home building industry, financial institutions, and the country.

During the debate on the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings proposal, there was not enough time to properly analyze the impact of the proposal on all veterans' programs. We did the best we could and, as I have indicated, we were able to protect the major income maintenance and health care programs. There are, however, other adjustments to be made and the bill I am introducing today, with Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT, and other members of our committee, if enacted, will make certain that programs for the more severely disabled veterans and education benefits under the "War Orphans Education Act" will not be subjected to reductions should another sequestration order be issued by the President.

Mr. Speaker, let me ask my colleagues whether they would have voted to curtail the following benefits which are part of the compensation package we provide to veterans with service-connected disabilities:

First, vocational rehabilitation benefits provided to veterans with service-connected disabilities enrolled in a program of vocational rehabilitation following discharge from service. Over 26,000 veterans enrolled in this program had their monthly subsistence benefit cut by 13.1 percent effective March 1, pursuant to Public Law 99-177.

Second, education and training assistance to dependents and survivors of veterans who are totally disabled due to service-connected disabilities. Approximately 51,800 dependents, spouses, and widows had their monthly educational assistance allowance reduced by 8.7 percent on March 1.

Third, specially adapted housing grants to certain permanently and totally disabled veterans. According to the VA, 455 veterans who are expected to receive these grants for "wheelchair homes" will see the grant reduced from $35,000 to $32,600.

Fourth, burial benefits in the case of veterans whose deaths are the result of service-connected disabilities. The widows or next of kin of such veterans will receive approximately 10 percent less than authorized by law, because of the sequestration order issued on March 1.

Fifth, automobile and adaptive equipment grants for certain severely disabled veterans. According to the VA, these benefits, which enable a disabled veteran to drive a vehicle, will be cut by 8 percent effective March 1.

Mr. Speaker, had I been a conferee on Public Law 99-177, I certainly would have asked my fellow conferees whether they intended to cut these programs. They are as much a part of the fabric of the benefits which we provide to the men and women who were injured in the service of their country as the basic compensation benefit, which was totally protected from any sequestration. Indeed, one can make the argument that these benefits are more important, because they are provided to a selected number of veterans whose disabilities are quite severe or to the survivors of those who have died of such disabilities; however, I will not make such an argument because I believe that all veterans with service-connected disabilities deserve special consideration.

Are the reductions fair, Mr. Speaker? I think not, and the measure we are introducing today will protect these programs from future cuts under Public Law 99-177. I urge my colleagues to support the bill and to join us in cosponsoring the measure.

KENTUCKY VOICE OF DEMOCRACY WINNER, CHERYL GENTRY

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, each year the Veterans of Foreign Wars and its ladies auxiliary conduct the Voice of Democracy Contest. This year more than 250,000 secondary school students participated in the contest and competed for the six national scholarships that are awarded as top prizes. The contest theme this year is "New Horizons for America's Youth."

The winning entry from the Commonwealth of Kentucky was delivered by Cheryl Renee Gentry of Horse Cave, KY—located in the Second Congressional District, which I have the privilege of representing in the Congress of the United States. Cheryl attends Caverna High School and is the daughter of Wayne and Rosie Gentry.

It is with great pleasure that I submit Cheryl's essay for insertion into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

Horizon literally defined is the line where the earth and sky seem to meet. One cannot see beyond the horizon.

I disagree. My definition of horizon is the limit of one's imagination, determination, and aspirations of what the future holds for him and for America.

Go back in time with me to the 1840's. A sixteen year old slave boy has just completed another work day in the cotton fields. The dinner bell has just rung. As he walks to his one room cabin that he shares with his brother and six other slaves, he looks up at the stars. He thinks about tomorrow—his future. What future? He thinks about his father who lies dead in a cold grave somewhere. At thirty he died in his master's cotton field. His chains which once bound him to his master's land are now broken. The boy realizes his father is now free, forevermore. A tear drops to his cheek. The boy knows his own death will be in a cotton field somewhere. He has no horizons. He can't even control his future. A white man with the highest bid does.

Time passes. The year is now 1908. Time has moved forward, but horizons for America's youth have not. A ten year old girl is finishing her sixteen hour work day in a textile factory. The child labor laws do not yet exist in America. She has no one to protect her future. Uneducated, the only work she is capable of doing is unskilled labor. Thus, she has little chance to better her horizons or her America.

Unlike their predecessors, youth in 1985 do have horizons. I am a sixteen year old youth. According to Walter Lippman: "The horizon should be vivid with splendor and hope". Today it is. I am able to attend school, learn, and use the knowledge I gain. This I consider a privilege. I'm entitled to my own opinion, and when I grow older, I will have the choice of any career my education permits me to have. I am not a slave to any man, nor is any man a slave to me.

The foundation of these privileges and rights was laid by the people of this great country, people that believed in life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, people that believed in liberty and justice for all, men and women of America that carried deep in their hearts a flame, a torch—the will that the nation they built with their own hands could and would be free.

America has evolved from the slave boy, the child factory worker, the founders of freedom into the youth of today. We represent America. America's youth have great visions. Through these visions we will move forward to a greater tomorrow.

Horizon, as my definition states, is the limit of one's imagination, determination, and aspirations. I believe, imagination, determination, and aspirations have no limits and no boundaries; thus the horizons of America's youth have none either.

I hold my future, my dreams, and America's horizons in my own hands; for they are now my own.

INSURANCE FAMINE PLAGUES THE NATION

HON. TOBY ROTH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I only need to recite a few specific cases to illustrate the need to reform our current tort system. A decade ago one manufacturer paid $15,000 for adequate coverage. Today he pays $750,000 for inadequate coverage. Ladder manufacturers pay more than 8 percent of sales for product liability insurance. Seven out of nine U.S. firms have stopped making anesthesia equipment because of high product liability costs.

The Nation is faced with a litigation explosion. The number of product liability suits has jumped from 1,600 in 1974 to 13,554 last year. In 1985 the average product liability award was $1.07 million—up from $345,000 10 years earlier.

Yesterday the other body held committee hearings on legislation designed to reform the system. It is the duty of this House to address the situation with all due speed. I commend to my colleagues the second in a series of Washington Post articles by T.R. Reid on "The Liability Crisis."

THE LIABILITY CRISIS: LITIGATION LOOSENS THE STIFF UPPER LIP

(By T.R. Reid)

Whatever happened to the stiff upper lip?

What happened to the tough, self-reliant, forbearing American—the kind who brushed off setback or injury and got on with the job?

Somewhere along the line, according to many social critics, that traditional role model of the American breed has given way to a new set of values reflecting a new attitude. This attitudinal shift, some say, has rejected the stiff upper lip and replaced it with a national mood demanding near-total redress for nearly every injury.

The shift is evident—to the point of becoming a stale joke—in the familiar cry of "Whiplash!" that accompanies many minor auto accidents. It is reflected in the curious incidents wherein passers-by at the site of accidents pretend to be victims in hope of grabbing a piece of the inevitable lawsuit.

This attitudinal shift may be one cause of the nation's current "civil liability crisis": America today has an excess of personal, corporate and governmental liability and a shortage of insurance to cover it.

The liability insurance crunch touches almost every element of American life. It will almost surely lead to higher prices and taxes for every consumer. It is forcing some familiar products and services off the market because they cannot be insured. And it could have an adverse effect on the worldwide competitiveness of U.S. companies.

This broad impact, in turn, has sparked major political battles in state capitals and in Washington as governments search for a solution. To date, the official responses have been atomized and often contradictory. There's nothing close to agreement on corrective action.

One reason the political system has not agreed on a fix is that there's no agreement on what is broken. Some talk of a "tort crisis," some see an "insurance crisis" and some speak of an "attitudinal crisis" in society.

Many business and political leaders argue that the nation's liability problem reflects a growing litigiousness in American life. This camp holds that there has been a "tort explosion" in recent years, with unprecedented numbers of civil cases burdening the legal system and civil defendants.

"Filing lawsuits has replaced baseball as our national pastime," says Colorado Gov. Richard D. Lamm. "'See you in court' used to be a real threat," Lamm says. "Now it's as common as 'Have a nice day.'"

Although many legal scholars have studied the question, there is no hard data showing a "tort explosion" in recent years. The per capita number of civil suits has increased in some states and dropped in others. In Lamm's Colorado, there are fewer personal injury suits per capita now than a decade ago.

As Chief Justice Warren E. Burger regularly complains, there has been a huge increase in civil cases filed in the federal courts over the past decade. But a "tort explosion" isn't the culprit.

Professor Marc Galanter of the University of Wisconsin, one of the leading scholars in this area, says the statistics mainly reflect a big increase in lawsuits over government aid payments. For liability cases, he says, "the pattern of use . . . is conservative, departing relatively little from earlier patterns."

The professor's point is that the United States, bulwark of individualism, has always been a litigious society. Alexis de Tocqueville's observation that every American dispute eventually finds its way to court was first published, after all, in 1835.

For these reasons, Galanter and others conclude that the alleged "explosion" in numbers of civil suits does not exist—and thus cannot explain the country's current liability crisis. They look for other explanations; economic patterns, social trends and changes in the substance, rather than the quantity, of civil law.

The insurance industry argues that the crisis is the fault of activist judges and fee-hungry lawyers who have expanded the legal concept of liability for physical, financial or emotional injury far beyond its traditional limits. Some consumer groups and many trial lawyers argue that the current crunch is the fault of short-sighted insurance executives who led their industry to the brink of financial disaster and want their business, professional and governmental customers to bail them out.

Both sides are right.

THE TORT CRISIS

The "tort crisis," as reflected in the expansion of legal definitions of liability, stems from a gradual but fundamental change in our society's notion of risk.

Once the American people prided themselves on qualities of toughness and forbearance. When the stagecoach turned over atop John Wayne, he dusted himself off and shrugged to Olivia de Havilland, "It's nothing, ma'am." That rugged acceptance of the risks of everyday life was considered a cardinal American virtue.

This attitude was enshrined in American law. "The general principle of our law," Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote in a famous treatise, "is that loss from an accident must lie where it falls, and this principle is not affected by the fact that human being is the instrument of misfortune."

That "general principle" probably wouldn't stand a chance in an American courtroom today. Our society has decided that loss from an accident need not lie with the victim. To the contrary, we have created mechanisms to assure that almost anyone who suffers injury will be reimbursed. The chief mechanism serving this purpose is the legal tort system. (In civil law, "tort" means a violation of the duty to avoid harming others.)

Where did this change in attitude come from?

Some sociologists suggest that the shift from quiet self-reliance to aggressive demand for redress results from a growing dependence on government. According to this theory, the same mindset that sees an "entitlement" to a government benefit check sees an "entitlement" to reimbursement for any hurt.

Another explanation lies in a "lottery" mentality, fueled by extensive state lottery advertising that seems to suggest that people are entitled to a windfall.

D.C. City Council member Nadine P. Winter noted this connection last fall when the council was debating no-fault auto insurance. She said some people think of an accident, and the resulting lawsuit, the way others think of the lottery: a way to make a quick million.

Whatever the soundness of this theory, the courts have been aligning themselves with this emerging social impulse for decades.

Two men played a crucial role in the extension of tort liability: Justice Roger Traynor of the California Supreme Court, one of the most distinguished state judges of his time, and Prof. William L. Prosser, a scholar and author who was to torts what Dr. Spock is to child care.

Prosser's books and articles, together with a series of Traynor opinions from 1946 to 1962, created an influential concept called "risk distribution." This theory deemphasized the question of who was at fault for an accident—in many modern accidents, the fault was hard to pinpoint—and moved toward a notion of "strict liability" that often made businesses (or their insurance carriers) pay damages to an injured person even if they had done no wrong.

The soaring expansion of civil liability in the state courts was matched by a series of federal court decisions that sharply increased the liability exposure of local and state governments. The old notion of "sovereign immunity"—the rule that a governmental unit could not be sued—was condemned to the trash heap as the courts permitted people to fight city hall in court over wrongs from police brutality to puddles on a public skating rink.

The momentum of legal change has continued almost unabated for four decades. Courts and juries continue to expand the range of business and governmental liability.

Exacerbating the changing rules of liability, the courts have been changing the rules for awarding damages as well. In addition to standard "compensatory" damages, which are supposed to make good any losses the victim suffered in an accident, courts and juries have been much more willing in recent years to award "punitive" damages. This kind of award is designed to punish a defendant for reprehensible conduct and the punishment sometimes runs into the millions of dollars.

If there has been a "tort explosion" in recent years, some contend, it is not in the numbers of cases filed but rather the explosive growth of punitive damage awards.

Highly publicized litigation, such as that following the 1981 collapse of the Kansas City Hyatt Regency Hotel skywalks that killed 114 during a tea dance, attracts great attention. So do large awards of punitive damages, or "punies," to use the trial lawyers' shorthand: $9 million to a man whose insurance company refused to pay a 46,000 claim; $128 million to a man burned when the fuel tank of his Pinto exploded in a crash.

People reading those headlines conclude that something crazy must be going on. Indeed, a business group called The Product Liability Alliance, which is working to reverse the expansion of tort liability, distributes a list of recent awards that it calls "the crazy cases list."

But almost all of these "crazy" awards have come from juries of ordinary, sane people. Many of them are later reduced by judges or appeals courts (the Pinto award was cut to $6.3 million.) and according to a recent study by the American Bar Foundation, the number and size of the megajudgments in liability cases are not as high as many believe.

To understand what prompts a jury to return a huge damage award, it might be instructive to look at one of the classic "crazy" cases.

A California man, Earl Norman, visited his doctor and then filed the $48 bill with his medical insurance company. The insurance company refused to pay, saying the visit wasn't covered in Norman's policy. Norman sued the insurance company over the unpaid $48 bill; the jury awarded him $4.5 million.

What possessed a jury to return an award 100,000 times as great as the unpaid doctor bill?

At the trial, Norman produced evidence showing that the insurer had paid that kind of bill routinely for years. Then Norman received a letter from the insurer urging him to buy a new and better policy at a higher premium. Norman brought the new policy. But under this new, more expensive policy, Norman's routine doctor visit was excluded from coverage.

Norman's lawyer argued that the insurance company had deliberately cut back its coverage—and deliberately misled its customers about the change. An actuarial expert testified that the new policy, if issued to all the insurance company's customers, would save the insurer $4.5 million.

The jury concluded that Norman had been victimized—and gave him the entire $4.5 million as recompense.

"This is the pattern for a lot of the so-called 'crazy cases,'" says Robert Hunter, an insurance expert who heads the National Insurance Consumer's Organization, a group affiliated with Ralph Nader.

"In the Earl Norman case, you have to say that the plaintiff was unjustly enriched by that million-dollar award. But you also have to say the defendant deserved the penalty it got. So yeah, it's crazy, but it's also not crazy."

The insurance company that lost the Norman case denounced the jury's award and swore to appeal. Eventually, however, the firm agreed to pay Norman $2 million and the case was settled before it reached the appellate court.

The expansion of the legal doctrine of "liability" and the growth of punitive damage awards have made it difficult to predict what a company or a government might be held liable for in the future. The uncertainty has been disastrous for insurance companies. They have no way to know what their liability exposure might be a year or a decade from now.

"There is no rule of law that today is certain," says Victor Schwartz, the Washington lawyer and tort scholar whose textbook is known to thousands of law students as "Schwartz on Torts." "That's an impossible situation for an insurance company. They try to set rates and run a business under certain rules of law, and then the rules change—and change constantly." (Schwartz has represented The Product Liability Alliance, a coalition of business groups that has lobbied for a change in the country's product liability laws.)

THE INSURANCE CRISIS

But the uncertainty of liability law provides only a partial explanation of the liability crisis of 1986. Much of the blame for the current problems facing the insurance industry belongs to the industry itself.

Insurance leaders readily admit that their industry is in fiscal trouble—and that the trouble in largely the industry's fault. A study carried out last year by the industry's research arm reached this conclusion: "The property/casualty must accept the major responsibility for its current financial condition."

In the late 1970s, when interest rates were reaching historic highs, insurance companies were eager, to put it mildly, to sell policies and thus take in premium payments that they could invest at interest rates as high as 20 percent. To sell more insurance, companies slashed prices and sold unusually risky policies. Actuarial and experience data were ignored in the competitive frenzy to accumulate premium dollars.

Today the insurers are reaping the results of their six-year binge. The firms are no longer getting high-interest returns on premium dollars, but claims are stil coming in on policies sold at deep discounts. In consequence, property and casualty insurance companies reported record operating losses in the past two years.

It's key to note that despite the big losses on "operations"—that is, on selling insurance and paying claims—the insurance industry still racked up $1 billion in net profits last year, thanks to gains on investments and federal tax credits.

This explains why insurance stocks remain the darlings of Wall Street. In 1985, while insurance executives were bewailing their operating losses and talking of a "crisis," property-casualty insurance stocks jumped by twice as much as the overall Standard & Poor's stock index.

That experience has prompted Ralph Nader and other consumer advocates to argue that the present insurance famine is simply a ploy by a healthy industry to force rates higher and to change the rules governing liability. The Federal Trade Commission is reportedly investigating whether insurance firms are engaged in a concerted boycott to drive up prices.

Insurance executives say, though, that the decline in interest earnings and the losses on operations have cut sharply into the reserve accounts they maintain to pay future claims. And with reserve accounts depleted, the companies say they have to limit the coverage they provide.

In summary, then, the current liability crunch that extends across the fabric of American life stems from disparate social and economic phenomena: a basic change in the nation's notion of risk, a broad expansion of the legal concept of liability and a series of managerial blunders by the insurance industry.

"There's not a single explanation," says Schwartz. "And that means there's not going to be a solution that works unless it gets to all the causes."

NBC'S POOR JUDGMENT

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to inform my colleagues of blatantly poor judgment on the part of the NBC network. Tonight at 8 p.m., NBC will air an episode of the program, "Highway to Heaven," that will deal with the tormenting of a Holocaust survivor by neo-Nazis. The name of the leader of these neo-Nazi tormentors is Jan Baltic.

I am certain that NBC meant no harm by creating this fictional name. One of my staff members had a conversation with a person working on the program who offered repeated assurances that no offense was intended. But why Jan Baltic? The first name, "Jan," is a very common Eastern European name and the last name, "Baltic," obviously refers to the Baltic countries of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. The association of neo-Nazism with the Baltic States, even if unintended and in a fictional setting, is rightfully repugnant to citizens of Baltic descent, some of whom experienced the atrocity of living under Nazi rule during the Second World War.

Even though no offense is intended, NBC should make amends. On the basis of the above conversation, however, the network has no plans to resolve the problem. Suggestions to dub over the name Jan Baltic with one that had no such connotations or, at the very least, to provide a disclaimer at the beginning of the show, were met with disapproval by NBC. I am joined by nearly a dozen ethnic and religious organizations in hoping that the network take such positive action. With the right to air programs comes the responsibility to maintain standards of propriety and fairness. It is hoped NBC takes this responsibility seriously.

UNIFORMED AND OVERSEAS CITIZENS ABSENTEE VOTING ACT

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, today I am joining with Mr. DICKINSON, Mr. HUTTO, and Mr. SCHUMER in introducing the "Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act."

Many of our fellow Americans live and work overseas—those who serve our country in uniform, or who are working for American companies with foreign installations.

They are entitled to vote, and most of them want to vote. Through the Federal Voting Assistance Act of 1955, and the Overseas Citizens Voting Rights Act of 1975, Congress has initiated ways to improve their ability to exercise their voting rights. State and local election jurisdictions have been responsive to our stimulus, and many of them have made efforts of their own as well.

As a result, it is now possible for all military and overseas voters to vote absentee. And most may both register and request an absentee ballot with a single application. The application, known as the Federal postcard application [FPCA], is a postage-free postcard printed and distributed by the Federal Government. In addition, voting assistance is widely available at military installations, and at U.S. embassies and consulates.

These and other steps have achieved the goal of ensuring that most overseas and uniformed voters have the opportunity to vote. Nevertheless, a few problems remain. Because mail service, is slow and unreliable in many parts of the world, a voter may not receive his absentee ballot in time to cast it before his or her State's deadline. This problem is particularly acute in States—such as those with late primaries—where ballots either are not printed or cannot be printed until a few short weeks before the election. In 1984, almost one-fifth of all ballots were not mailed to applicants until the last 2 weeks of October.

And that is the reason behind the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act. The purpose of this bill is to allow an overseas voter who applied for an absentee ballot in a timely fashion, but who did not receive it in time to return it before the voting deadline, to use an alternative, write-in ballot for Federal candidates.

There are several components to this proposal:

First, write-in ballots will be placed overseas at military bases and in embassies and consulates.

Second, any registered voter who applies for a regular absentee ballot at least 30 days before an election, but who fails to receive that ballot in time to vote it, mail it, and have it arrive by the State deadline, will be entitled to use the write-in. On the write-in ballot, the voter will be able to vote for Federal offices—President, Vice President, Senator and Representative.

Third, if the voter receives a regular absentee after having sent in the write-in, the voter could go ahead and return the regular absentee as well.

Fourth, all absentee ballots will be held by local election officials until the day when absentees are usually counted in the State in question. At that time, if the voter's regular absentee ballot has been received, the election officials will discard the write-in and count the regular absentee. But if the regular ballot has not arrived, the write-in will be counted.

This is a simple proposal. It will not add a new class of voters, it will simply provide a voting opportuntiy for individuals who took all necessary steps to exercise their franchise, but who—through no fault of their own—did not receive their absentee ballots in time.

The Subcommittee on Elections, which I chair, started working on a draft bill early this year. It does two things. First, it combines and consolidates the laws currently on the books—minus their many obsolete and conflicting provisions. Second, and most important, it incorporates the wrote-in ballot proposal.

On February 6 of this year, the subcommittee held a hearing on the idea. We heard testimony from Henry Valentino, Director of the Federal Voting Assistance Program that works with military and overseas voters, as well as with State and local election officials from around the country.

We also had witnesses from Democrats Abroad, Republicans Abroad, the National Association of Uniformed Services, and the Non-Commissioned Officers Association.

Finally, we heard from State and local election officials. They represented several States, including both those with State absentee ballots similar to the proposed Federal ballot, and States without such special ballots.

In response to some of the suggestions we have received, modifications will no doubt be necessary as we work to refine this proposal, but my good friends from Alabama, Florida and New York have joined with me in introducing the bill today in order to make it available for your suggestions, and for your support. We urge you to join with us in sponsoring this simple but important proposal.

GEN. TERRENCIO SIERRA 1986

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, during the past weekend I had the privilege of visiting with the Army National Guard constructing a road in Honduras. This is the second consecutive year that these citizen soldiers have conducted their annual training in Central America. Last year these guardsmen helped build a 15-kilometer road in Panama during "Blazing Trails 1985." That training was so successful for our troops, and the Panamanian people, that I suggested these exercises should be expanded to other countries in the region. The Government of Honduras recognized the benefits of these exercises and requested one for their country.

Once again all the members of my group were impressed with the high morale of our guardsmen. They see the benefits of this realistic training and how, when the road is completed, the Honduran people will reap the fruits of their labors. The guardsmen realize that they are our ambassadors of good will to the Honduran people.

I met with several Hondurans whose lives will be enhanced by our road building. These people were unanimous in praising the efforts of our guardsmen. As a Missourian, I have always been proud of the work of the Missouri National Guard. This year there is an extra bit of pride involved since Missouri is providing the leadership for this year's exercise. Col. Bob Harris of the 135th Engineering Group in Cape Girardeau, MO, is commanding the task force for this year's exercise. Also, I must make mention of the 110th Engineering Battalion, commanded by Lt. Col. John Holman, as making a great contribution to this exercise. These guardsmen are doing an outstanding job under difficult conditions.

I submit for the RECORD that section of my trip report concerning "Gen. Terrencio Sierra 1986." I would like to repeat my suggestion from last year that these type exercises should be expanded to other countries. They provide excellent training for our Guard personnel and a useable road that enriches the lives of the local people.

APPENDIX I: GEN. TERRENCIO SIERRA 1986

The objective of exercise "General Terrencio Sierra '86" is to repair and construct 20 kilometers of road in the north-central Honduran province of Yoro. The exercise was named by the Honduran Government after a turn-of-the-century patriot and president.

Part of the exercise area was the site of a combined U.S.-Honduran exercise in July-September 1985 called "Cabanas '85". At that time a pioneer road was constructed between the towns of Jocon and San Lorenzo. This area of Honduras is very remote and sparsely populated. The exercise will replace a cattle trail that is impassable, except on foot, several months during the year, with a 20-foot compacted gravel road. The improved road will connect the towns of Puenticita and Jocon. This "farm-to-market" road will be actively used by lumber companies in this timber region.

Honduran and National Guard engineers are jointly constructing the road. They are operating from the base camp named "Oso Grande (Big Bear)" in honor of the bears that appear on Missouri's state seal.

The exercise involves almost 5,000 National Guard engineers and support personnel from Missouri, Alabama, North Dakota, California, Florida, Kentucky, Maryland, South Carolina, Tennessee, New Mexico, West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Arizona. This exercise is part of the annual two-week active duty training for these volunteer citizen-soldiers. The guardsmen rotate to the exercise site in 17 day cycles, working 6½ days a week.

The exercise provides valuable experience in mobilization and deployment techniques as well as essential training in their skills in time of crisis, e.g. engineering, logistics, communications, etc. Our medical personnel are also receiving excellent training. As they treat the local people they are seeing medical problems not usually encountered in the United States. These guardsmen will benefit from training in a remote, austere environment under realistic wartime conditions.

Funding is being shared by the Defense Department (training and support costs of U.S. personnel) and Honduras (all materials and fuel). The U.S. costs would be incurred under normal training conditions, irrespective of location.

The exercise is going well. The morale of the National Guardsmen is sky high. Many members expressed their enthusiasm for this type of training exercise. They are seeing the living conditions of Central America first hand while constructing a project that will positively impact on the local citizens.

We talked with several Honduran citizens who unanimously supported the road project. They were very supportive of the United States and this road project.

H.R. 4381, TO PROVIDE INTERMEDIATE FUNDING FOR THE SUPERFUND PROGRAM

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, at the request of the administration, H.R. 4381, which will provide intermediate funding for the Superfund Program. I support the administration position that those Americans who need to be protected by a speedy cleanup of toxic waste would best be served by a 5-year reauthorization of the Superfund Program—not intermediate funding. A sound program requires long-term commitments and, therefore, long-term funding.

However, there is a serious risk that this Congress will fail to produce a timely reauthorization. Indeed, the Superfund conferees have only begun to meet and have not made significant progress. If the reauthorization process is not completed by the end of March, the resulting shortfall in funding is likely to cause the kind of programmatic damage that can only be corrected through costly rebuilding. It is essential that intermediate funding be put in place to protect against this possibility.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to approve a temporary financing package for the Superfund Program as soon as possible to avoid unacceptable disruptions of this essential program. Following that, the Congress should move as soon as possible to complete the 5-year reauthorization process.

A section-by-section analysis of the administration's short-term funding legislation is set forth below.

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This section denotes the Act as the "Superfund Interim Financing Act of 1986" in order to stress the short-term nature of the legislation and the need for a full, five-year reauthorization of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 ("CERCLA" or "Superfund").

SEC. 2. EXTENSION OF ENVIRONMENTAL TAXES.

This section, in combination with sections 5 and 6, provides new taxing authority for the Superfund by reimposing the environmental taxes set out in Chapter 38 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 at their original rates, beginning on April 1, 1986. The taxes are on petroleum and certain chemicals. The taxes are designed to repay the advance made to the fund under the borrowing authority provided for in section 4 and will terminate when sufficient revenues have been raised to repay all borrowed funds, together with interest.

SEC. 3. TERMINATION OF TAX ON HAZARDOUS WASTES.

This section insures that the tax on hazardous wastes received at qualified hazardous waste disposal facilities, which supports the post-closure liability trust fund under CERCLA, will not be reimposed pending a congressional decision on whether to continue the post-closure fund.

SEC. 4. EXTENSION OF REPAYABLE ADVANCE AUTHORITY.

This section amends the original authority to borrow under CERCLA by authorizing a repayable advance to the response trust fund in fiscal year 1986 in an amount not to exceed $861,300,000. This section, together with sections 2 and 5, which enact new taxing authority to support the Superfund Program, will provide funding sufficient to operate the program for a 12-month period at the appropriation level established for fiscal year 1986.

SEC. 5. TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.

This section amends CERCLA by repealing section 303, the expiration and sunset provision, so as to permit the imposition of new taxes under section 2 of this Act.

SEC. 6. EFFECTIVE DATE.

This section makes the provisions of the Act, including the taxes, effective on April 1, 1986.

HONORING CHARLES A. HALLECK

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 11, 1986

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in mourning the passing of Charles Halleck, a former Member of this House who died, March 3, in Lafayette, IN.

Charlie Halleck and I were frequently on opposite sides of issues—the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore comes to mind—but Charlie didn't hold grudges, and we always remained friends.

For nearly 20 of his 33 years in this House, Charlie Halleck led his party with passion and commitment, but he was always fair to the opposition and always a gentleman.

Charlie Halleck served his Nation, and congressional district with distinction. I am sorry that he is gone, and I extend my sympathy to his family.

MARTIN FELDSTEIN ON PRIVATIZATION AND DEFICIT REDUCTION

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, the administration's budget proposal includes the sale of the Bonneville Power Administration [BPA]. We're told that we should go along with the sale of the BPA, notwithstanding the fact that such a sale would devastate the economy of the Pacific Northwest, because it would contribute $8.85 billion toward deficit reduction.

The $8.85 billion in deficit reduction is awfully tempting; but the fact of the matter is that it's an illusion. This is what Martin Feldstein, who used to be chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Reagan, has to say about the effect that the proposed BPA sale would have on the deficit:

"Although government accounting methods would make it look as if Federal spending and receipts are in better balance, these asset sales would do nothing to lessen the burden of the deficit. That burden occurs because Government borrowing to finance the deficit preempts savings that would otherwise be available for private investment in plant and equipment and in housing construction. The administration's proposed asset sales would preempt private savings every bit as much as a Federal sale of new debt of the same value."

The real reason for the administration's BPA sale proposal is clearly based on an ideological commitment to eliminate Government wherever possible—with little regard for the social or economic impact. We must address the issue of privatization in that context, and not based on an erroneous belief that it would reduce the deficit burden.

CONGRATULATIONS DAVID L. EBERSOLE

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to recognize the achievement of Mr. David L. Ebersole, a constituent of mine from Middletown, PA. On Sunday, March 16, 1986, kith and kin will gather to recognize the achievements of this outstanding young man at an Eagle Recognition Dinner held at the American Legion Post 594, Middletown.

David, who has been in the Scouting program from Cubs, Webelos through Scouts, possessed an uncommon determination toward achieving the highest rank in Boy Scouting—the coveted Eagle Scout Award.

As a student at Middletown High School, David has devoted himself to many school activities including participation in the stage band, chorus, and brass ensemble and has been listed in "Who's Who Among American High School Students." Mr. Ebersole has been accepted at Hawthorne College, NH.

I am proud to congratulate Mr. Ebersole for his outstanding contributions to his community. His unselfish attitude toward others has set an example for the rest of us to follow. I am honored to have an individual like David in my congressional district.

AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL INSECTICIDE, FUNGICIDE, AND RODENTICIDE ACT

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing, along with my colleagues, Mr. ROBERTS and Mr. BROWN of California, legislation to reauthorize and to amend the basic law that governs the production and use of pesticides in this country.

This bill, the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986, is the product of months of hard work between a major segment of the pesticide industry and a coalition of environmental, consumer, and labor organizations. As a review of their work makes apparent, they must be commended for the determination and flexibility with which they sought to resolve the controversy that has for some time made FIFRA reform one of the most intractable issues before the Congress. The measure represents countless hours of negotiations and compromise between these parties and offers—as efforts of this kind must—something for both sides.

I believe the agreement demonstrates that both sides can come out a winner in undertakings of this sort. The industry stands to gain from the accelerated and streamlined regulatory process which promises to emerge from the effort, and the environmental, consumer, and labor groups apparently have achieved many of the safeguards they have sought regarding the manufacture and use of pesticides. Moreover, both will benefit, I think, if the public abandons its perception that each side often was prevented by dogmatic and inflexible positions from recognizing the legitimate concerns of the other.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that this legislation will provide the basic framework for achieving the progress that we must make this year in reauthorizing and reforming FIFRA. The Agriculture Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture, which I chair, has scheduled hearings on this legislation and related issues for March 19 and 20, and it is my firm intention to hold to a steady schedule of legislative activity this spring so that we can have a FIFRA reform package before the House this summer.

As we move ahead, however, it must be pointed out that not everyone has endorsed this compromise agreement, and that some may in fact oppose portions of the measure. Among those not a party to the agreement are a number of the farm and commodity organizations and various producers and users of pesticides. Many of these groups have special FIFRA concerns and they will have an opportunity, as we proceed with our work, to make those concerns known.

Mr. Speaker, FIFRA reform must be made one of the major environmental priorities of this session, and I urge our colleagues to lend their support to this effort.

The text of the bill and a section-by-section analysis follows:

FEDERAL INSECTICIDE, FUNGICIDE, AND RODENTICIDE ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986 SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SHORT TITLE

Section 1 provides that this Act may be cited as the "Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act Amendments of 1986" (hereinafter referred to as "the Amendments") and supplies a table of contents.

REFERENCES

Section 2 states that, except as otherwise specifically provided in the Amendments, an amendment or repeal of a section or other provision shall be considered to be made to a section or provision of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (7 U.S.C. 136 et seq.) (hereinafter referred to as "the Act").

PREREGISTRATION ACCESS TO DATA

Section 101(a) adds a new paragraph (9) to section 3(c) of the Act, providing the public preregistration access to certain data used to support pesticide registrations.

Subparagraph (A) establishes that, prior to the registration of a pesticide, the Administrator shall provide public access to health, safety and environmental data that are submitted in support of an initial application for the registration for a new active ingredient or initial food use of a previously registered active ingredient.

Subparagraph (B) states that the administrator shall publish in the Federal Register a notice of the application for registration of a pesticide in accordance with section 3(c)(4), as modified by section 101(b) of the Amendments.

Subparagraph (C) states that, not later than thirty (30) days after publication of the public notice, a person seeking access to the data must send by certified mail a request for access and an affirmation described in section 3(c)(9)(E). Such request and affirmation must be sent simultaneously to the Administrator and to the applicant for pesticide registration. A person wishing to make public comments on the proposed registration without examining the data can continue to do so as under current law.

Subparagraph (D) provides the Administrator shall either grant or deny the request within 15 days of receipt and may not extend the time for acting on the request.

Subparagraph (E) requires that, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the preregistration data may be made available only to a person who provides an affirmation, and such supporting evidence as the Administrator considers necessary, that the person is neither employed by nor acting directly or indirectly on behalf of a person or entity engaged or affiliated with a person engaged in the production, sale, or distribution of a pesticide. Supporting evidence might be a business or identification card or letter of authorization. The subparagraph also defines affiliate. The required affirmation shall state that the person is neither employed by nor acting on behalf of a pesticide producer, seller or distributor, or affiliate; shall identify any business, employer, or other entity, if any, on whose behalf the person is requesting access to the data; and affirm that the person will not intentionally or recklessly violate the preregistration access to data provisions of paragraph (9). Finally, the subparagraph provides that 18 U.S.C. section 1001 shall apply to the affirmation.

Subparagraph (F)(i) states that the preregistration data shall be made available to persons only for the purpose of permitting the person to comment to the Administrator on the application for registration of the pesticide. It is intended that comments may be exchanged with others for peer review within the restrictions of this subsection. The subparagraph provides further in clause (ii) that, except for certain exceptions described in clause (iii) and (iv) of the subparagraph, the data so obtained may not be published, copied, or transferred to any other individual or entity for use to obtain approval to sell, manufacture, or distribute a pesticide anywhere in the world, and may not be used in litigation or agency proceedings prior to the registration's approval or after the Administrator's decision if the application for registration is denied. Clause (iii) of the subparagraph states that data relating to a pesticide may be reasonably quoted in comments submitted to the Administrator, but that the comments may not be made public prior to the decision by the Administrator on the registration or after such decision if the application for the registration is denied. Clause (iv) states that preregistration data and comments may be disclosed, consistent with section 10 of the Act, after registration of the pesticide.

Subparagraph (G) provides procedures for the Administrator's disclosure of preregistration data as follows:

(i) The data may be examined in an office of the Environmental Protection Agency or an appropriate state agency that complies with section 3 and may not be removed from the office.

(ii) The Administrator shall maintain a record of the persons who inspect the data and a copy of the record entry shall be sent to the date submitter.

(iii) Once access to the data is granted, the data may be examined and comments on the application filed within sixty (60) days, unless extended an additional thirty (30) days for good cause.

(iv) If access to the data is denied, comments on the application shall be filed within sixty (60) days of a decision to deny access.

Section 101(b) makes changes to section 3(C)(4) regarding the notice of application, requiring the Administrator to publish the notice of application within 30 days of receipt and provide a 60 day comment period.

Section 102 amends section 14(b)(3) of the Act regarding criminal penalties for disclosure of information. Subparagraph (A) restates current law. Subparagraph (B) is a new requirement which states that any person, including any officer, contractor or employee of the United States or State who (i) is granted preregistration access to data and (ii) in furtherance of a commercial purpose involving the production, registration, distribution or sale of a pesticide, knowingly violates section 3(c)(9) regarding preregistration access to data, or knowingly allows the data to be made available in violation of the section shall be fined not more than $100,000, or imprisoned for not more than three years, or both.

CONDITIONAL REGISTRATION

Section 201 amends section 3(c)(7) (B) and (C) of the Act regarding conditional registrations.

Subparagraph B is amended to state in clause (i) that the Administrator may conditionally amend a registration of a pesticide to permit additional uses of a pesticide, notwithstanding that certain data concerning the pesticide may be insufficient to support an unconditional amendment, if the Administrator determines that (I) the applicant has submitted all additional data that are required solely for the proposed additional use; (II) amending the registration in the manner proposed by the applicant would not materially increase the risk of an unreasonable adverse effect on the environment; and (III) the additional use is in the public interest. The amended provision more clearly describes the requirement on the applicant to provide data on the new use. The term "significantly" in the Act is deleted and replaced with the term "materially". Finally, conditional amendments for a new use must be in the public interest, a new provision similar to the current requirement for conditional registrations for new products under section 3(c)(7)(C).

Subparagraph (B) states further in clause (ii) that, notwithstanding clause (i), no registration of a pesticide may be amended to permit an additional use of the pesticide if the Administrator has issued a notice stating that the pesticide, or any ingredient, meets or exceeds risk criteria associated in whole or in part with human dietary exposure specified in regulations issued under the Act. The revised provision also eliminates the Administrator's current authority to issue conditional registrations for minor use pesticides in similar circumstances.

Clauses (iii) and (iv) restate provisions of the current law that an applicant seeking an amended conditional registration shall submit data that would be required to obtain an unconditional registration for a similar pesticide under section 3(c)(5) of the Act. Further, except as provided in clause (v), if an applicant is unable to submit an item of data (other than data pertaining to the proposed additional new use) because it has not yet been generated, the Administrator may amend the registration of a pesticide under such conditions as will require the submission of the data not later than the time such data are required for similar pesticides already registered.

Clause (v) is a new provision which states that, if data concerning chronic toxicity (oncogenicity, reproductive effects, and mutagenicity), neurotoxicity, or teratogenicity are required for registration of an additional major use of a pesticide and such data requirement was in effect at the time the studies to obtain the data commenced, a conditional registration for the use shall not be granted unless the data are submitted. This provision ensures that conditional registrations will not be granted when key studies have not been submitted.

Clause (vi) adds that an amendment to an existing conditional registration may be issued if the registrant has initiated necessary tests to secure the data, even though the data have not been submitted, and satisfied the other requirements in paragraph 7 for the amendment of a conditional registration. This clause is intended to permit an amendment to an existing conditional registration, such as a label change, provided the change does not create a new use and the amendment meets other requirements of the section.

Subparagraph (C) restates current provisions of the Act in clauses (i) and (ii), regarding the conditions under which the Administrator may conditionally register a pesticide containing an active ingredient not contained in any currently registered pesticide. Clause (iii) of subparagraph 3 provides an additional requirement for new pesticides that, if data concerning chronic toxicity (oncogenicity, reproductive effects, and mutagenicity), neurotoxicity, or teratogenicity are required for registration of the pesticide and such a data requirement was in effect at the time the studies to obtain the data commenced, a conditional registration shall not be granted unless such data have been submitted.

REREGISTRATION AND REVENUES

Section 301 amends section 2 of the Act by adding a definition of "outstanding data requirement". This definition clarifies the meaning of a data gap. Subsection (ff) states that:

(1) the term "outstanding data requirement" means any study, required information, or data necessary to make a determination under section 3(C)(5) that has (A) not been submitted to the Administrator, or (B) has been submitted but which the Administrator determines are not valid, complete, or adequate to make a determination under section 3.

(2) In making a determination under clause (B), the Administrator shall examine, at a minimum, relevant protocols, documentation of the conduct and analysis of the study, and the results of the study to determine whether the study and the results of the study fulfill the data requirement for which the study was submitted to the Administrator.

Section 302 replaces section 3(g) of the Act, regarding the reregistration of pesticides, with an expanded section.

Paragraph (1) states that the Administrator shall reregister each pesticide in accordance with subsection (g).

Paragraph (2) provides that the Administrator shall establish two priority lists of pesticide active ingredients for reregistration. Subparagraph (A) requires the Administrator to publish in the Federal Register a priority list of three hundred (300) pesticide active ingredients for reregistration, within 60 days of the effective date of the Amendments. Subparagraph (B) requires the Administrator to publish a second list of remaining active ingredients for reregistration, within 90 days of the effective date.

Paragraph (3) establishes criteria for setting the priority for the active ingredient pesticides on the lists required under paragraph (2) and states that the Administrator shall give the highest priority to pesticides that:

(A) are in major use on or in food or feed that may result in post-harvest residues,

(B) may result in residues of potential toxicological concern in potable groundwater, edible fish, or shellfish,

(C) have previously been determined by the Administrator to have the most significant outstanding data requirements, or

(D) are used on crops, including in greenhouses and nurseries, where worker exposure is most liekly to occur.

Paragraph (4) states that, not later than ninety (90) days after publication of each priority list, the Administrator shall remove an active ingredient from the list if the Administrator is requested by all registrants of all pesticides containing the active ingredient that the registratioins of their pesticides should be cancelled.

Paragraph (5) states that establishment of the lists by the Administrator shall not be subject to judicial review.

Paragraph (6) establishes the procedures to be followed by the Administrator in determining data requirements for reregistration. The procedures are as follows:

(A) Not later than eighteen (18) months after the effective date of the Amendments, the Administrator shall identify and publish in the Federal Register a list of the outstanding data requirements for each active ingredient pesticide identified in the first list under paragraph 2(A), and simultaneously notify each existing registrant of pesticides containing such active ingredient that, in order to maintain the registration of the pesticide, the registrant must fill the outstanding data requirements within a reasonable amount of time, not to exceed four (4) years after the notice.

(B) Not later than twenty-four (24) months after the effective date of the Amendments, the Administrtor shall identify and publish in the Federal Register a list of the outstanding data requirements for the remaining active ingredients identified in the second list under paragraph 2(B), simultaneiously notify applicable registrants of such requirements, and require the studies to be filled with a reasonable time, not to exceed four (4) years after the notice. It is anticipated that the Administrator would set deadlines shorter than four (4) years for studies that can be completed more quickly, as done in current data call-in notices.

(C) The Administrator may extend the period of time for completion of the studies by no more than two (2) years if extraordinary circumstances beyond the control of the registrant prevent filling the outstanding data requirement. Such extraordinary circumstances mean non-negligent loss of laboratory results, destruction of laboratory results, major animal loss, or similar unanticipated catastrophes.

(D) If a hearing is requested following the issuance of a notice under subsection (c)(2)(B) to fill outstanding data requirements, the registrant may appeal in the hearing the classification of the study as an outstanding data requirement and other matters for resolution in subsection (c)(2)(B)(iv).

Paragraph (7) states that the Administrator shall take certain steps to ascertain whether the outstanding data requirements are being met. Subparagraph (A) requires that, not later than six (6) months after issuance of the notice required in paragraph (6) for the pesticide active ingredient, the Administrator shall determine whether appropriate tests have been initiated to fill the identified outstanding data requirement. Subparagraph (B) requires that the registrant shall submit annual progess reports to the Administrator to indicate the status of testing and to report interim results. The purpose of this provision is to ensure that the Administrator keeps track of whether studies have begun.

Paragraph (8) provides that the Administrator shall issue a notice of intent to suspend the registration of a pesticide under subsection (c)(2)(B)(iv), if the Administrator determines that (A) necessary tests have not been initiated within one year of issuance of the notice, (B) progress is insufficient to ensure the completion of the tests within the deadlines established in the notice, (C) the required test data have not been submitted to the Administrator within the specified deadline, or (D) a registrant has failed to comply with section 3(c)(2)(B)(ii) and (iii) regarding steps to secure the additional data, joint development of data, and cost-sharing.

Paragraph (9) desribes the requirements on the Administrator for reregistration. Subparagraph (A) states that not more than one (1) year after receipt of the data required by the notice, the Administrator shall complete reregistration of the pesticide by determining whether the pesticide fulfills the requirements of section 3(c)(5). Subparagraph (B) states further that the Administrator shall determine whether a pesticide should be reregistered by conducting a thorough examination of all data or taking such other steps necessary to make the determination.

Paragraph (10) establishes certain fees for reregistration. The imposition of these fees does not suggest that the Administrator is authorized under this Act or other statutes to impose other reregistration or registration fees. The requirements of this new provision are as follows:

Subparagraph (A) states that the Administrator shall charge and collect reregistration fees from registrants in accordance with paragraph (10).

Subparagraph (B) provides that, to identify outstanding data requirements for each pesticide required to be reregistered, upon issuance of the notice requiring certain data under section 3(c)(2)(B), the Administrator shall change and collect from the registrant or registrants of the pesticide active ingredient a one-time fee of $50,000. The amendment states further that no fee shall be collected for a pesticide voluntarily cancelled in accordance with paragraph (4).

Subparagraph (C) states that, to evaluate data and reregister a pesticide, upon submission of data required by the notice issued under section 3(c)(2)(B), the Administrator shall charge and collect from the registrant or registrants of the active ingredient pesticide an additional one-time fee of $100,000. The fee is divided into two payments so that EPA can receive the necessary revenues both to identify the data gaps and then evaluate the data after the studies are completed. Also, an active ingredient registrant who decides not to conduct the required studies will not have to pay the second fee.

Subparagraph (D) allows that, if a pesticide active ingredient is registered solely for uses other than for food or feed, the Administrator may levy a reduced fee for reregistration, but not less than one-half of the fee charged for an active ingredient pesticide registered for use on food or feed. This reduced fee for non-food pesticides stems from the fact it takes less data to register such an active ingredient. In addition, formulators are exempted from paying any fee under an amendment to section 3(c)(2)(D).

Subparagraph (E) makes clear that, on payment of the fee for reregistration of an active ingredient, the Administrator may not levy any other fees for reregistration of the active ingredient.

Subparagraph (F) states that, if there are two or more registrants of an active ingredient, the fee shall be apportioned by such registrants in accordance with section 3.

Paragraph (11) establishes procedures for managing the reregistration fee revenues through a revolving fund, not subject to fiscal year limitation, so that EPA will devote these fees directly to reregistration. The paragraph requires the Administrator to provide an annual accounting of the fees collected and dispersed from the revolving fund, and take all steps necessary to insure that expenditures are solley used to carry out reregistration.

Paragraph (12) makes clear that, on submission of data or fees required under the reregistration subsection, the data submitter shall be compensated in accordance with section 3(c)(1)(D). If fees for data are submitted jointly by two or more registrants, an agent shall be appointed by the registrants at the time of the joint submission or payment of the reregistration fee to handle any subsequent compensation matters.

INERT INGREDIENTS

Section 401 amends section 2(n) regarding the definition of "ingredient statement." The section restates the provisions in the current law and adds that the name of each inert ingredient listed on the priority list established under section (3)(h)(1) shall be included in the ingredient statement. Thus, if an inert ingredient is one of the 50 to 75 EPA decides must be tested because it may be hazardous or is in widespread use, it will be listed on the product label. The amendment adds further that an inert ingredient shall be identified by its most common name.

Section 402 amends section 3(c)(2)(D) regarding compensation for data on inert ingredients. The amendment adds a new clause to subparagraph (D) stating that no applicant for registration of a pesticide who proposes to purchase an inert ingredient from another producer in order to formulate the pesticide shall be required to offer to pay reasonable compensation, otherwise required by paragraph (1)(D) for a study required to be cited or submitted, that was generated under the Toxic Substances Control Act or, in certain circumstances, under the Act.

Section 403(a) amends section 3(c)(5) regarding approval of registrations of pesticides containing substitute inert ingredients. The amendment makes certain technical changes and adds a new subparagraph (E) to section 3(C)(5) requiring, in the case of an application to amend a registration to substitute an inert ingredient for an inert ingredient listed under new section 3(h)(1), that the requirements of new section (3)(i), regarding testing of inerts, are satisfied.

Section 403(b) states further that section 3(c)(5) is amended by adding a requirement that, on or after the date specified for submission of a study in the final data development plan published under section 3(h)(1), an application to register or amend a registration of a pesticide containing a listed inert ingredient shall be considered not to satisfy the requirements of section 3(c)(5), unless the application is supported by the study required under paragraph (1)(D).

Section 404 establishes requirements for a priority list of inert ingredients to be reviewed and the data development plans for those ingredients. Section 3 is amended by adding a new subsection (h). The amendment provides as follows:

Paragraph (1) establishes a priority list of inert ingredients consisting of (A) inert ingredients that appear to cause a pesticide to meet or exceed a criterion for initiating an interim administrative review established under section 3(c)(8); and (B) inert ingredients for which additional data are reasonably necessary to evaluate whether the inert ingredient may result in the pesticide causing an unreasonable adverse effect on the environment—

(i) that are similar in molecular structure to a chemical that is oncogenic, mutagenic, teratogenetic, or causes another significant adverse effect, and have a significant use in pesticides or to which there is significant exposure from pesticides, or

(ii) to which there is significant and widespread exposure or that are in widespread use in pesticides.

Paragraph (2) requires the priority list to be published not later than ninety (90) days after the effective date of the Amendments, and that the Administrator shall publish revisions to the list at least annually. Thus, the priority list is dynamic, with inerts coming on and off the list in accordance with the criteria.

Paragraph (3) states that the priority list and any revisions shall not be subject to judicial review at the time that the initial or revised priority list is published. Any judicial review will occur at the time the final data development plans are issued.

Paragraph (4) states that an inert ingredient included on the priority list under paragraph (1)(A), because it has appeared to cause a pesticide to trigger an interim administrative review, shall be removed from the priority list upon (A) a final decision by the Administrator not to initiate an interim administrative review with respect to any pesticide containing the inert ingredient, or final action by the Administrator concluding the interim administrative review, any subsequent actions under section 6, and judicial review, and (B) a final decision by the Administrator not to require additional data, or the receipt and evaluation by the Administrator of all required data, any actions under section (6), and judicial review.

Paragraph (5) states that an inert ingredient included on the priority list under paragraph (1)(B), because of the need for additional data, shall be removed from the priority list upon (A) a final decision by the Administrator not to require additional data, and any subsequent judicial review, or (B) the receipt and evaluation by the Administrator of all required data, any subsequent actions under section (6), and judicial review.

Paragraph (6) states that the priority list shall consist of not less than fifty (50), and not more than seventy-five (75) inert ingredients. Further, the list shall initially consist of fifty (50) inert ingredients, with twenty-five (25) additional inert ingredients added to the list fifteen (15) months after the effective date of the Amendments. This means the list will be expanded one year after the first list is established.

Paragraph (7) establishes procedures for the Administrator's formulation of data development plans for inert ingredients included on the priority list.

Subparagraph (A) requires the Administrator to publish a proposed data development plan for each inert ingredient within one year after the ingredient is listed.

Subparagraph (B) requires that the proposed development plan include (j) a discussion of the risk concerns raised by the inert ingredient and the anticipated exposures to man and the environment, (ii) the studies that the Administrator proposes to require to address those concerns or, if the Administrator proposes not to require additional studies, a discussion of the reasons, (iii) the regulatory mechanisms or other procedures the administrator proposes to use to generate the studies, and (iv) the dates for submission of the studies.

Subparagraph (C) further states that the proposed development plan shall require the submission of the studies within a reasonable time, not to exceed four (4) years after the issuance of the final data development plan. The Administrator may extend the period for development of the studies by no more than two (2) years if extraordinary circumstances beyond the control of the registrant prevent the submission of the studies.

Subparagraph (D) identifies the factors that the Administrator shall consider in preparing a proposed data development plan. These factors are: (i) the minor use factors referred to in section 3(c)(2)(A); (ii) the guidelines published under section 3(c)(2)(A); (iii) the use of tiered testing program, under which the need for long-term studies would be evaluated after receipt of short-term studies; (iv) the use of other statutory authorities such as the Toxic Substances Control Act, to require the generation of the studies on an equitable basis, considering nonpesticide uses, and within the dates specified in the data development plan; and (v) data generated or scheduled for generation. It is intended that the Administrator should consider non-pesticide uses of the chemical in determining where the testing burden should lie. In general, the Toxic Substances Control Act should be used whenever the quantity of the substance used in pesticides is small in relation to the total quantity produced, or the exposure to the environment from the use of the substance in pesticides is small in relation to the exposure to the environment from the manufacture, processing and disposal of the substance, and from its uses other than in pesticides.

Subparagraph (E) provides for a sixty (60) day comment period on the proposed plan.

Subparagraph (F) requires the Administrator to publish a final data development plan or a final decision to require no additional studies within 30 days of the close of the comment period. The Administrator's final decision shall be subject to judicial review under section 16. The omission of an inert ingredient from the priority list shall be subject to judicial review under section 16 at any time after the first data development plan is published.

Subparagraph (G) provides that the Administrator shall take appropriate action to implement the final data development plan at the same time as the publication of the plan, including data call-in notices. If a hearing is requested by a registrant, the registrant may contest whether the Administrator has considered all the factors required to be considered and included in the data development plan under subparagraphs (B) and (D).

Subparagraph (H) states that, upon receipt of the additional data for the inert ingredients, the Administrator is required within one year to evaluate the data and take such steps as are appropriate to prevent any unreasonable adverse effects on the environment from pesticides containing such inert ingredients.

Subparagraph (I) makes clear that, for purposes of section 3(c)(1)(D), any study generated with other than public funds under a data development plan using another statutory authority of the Administrator (e.g., the Toxic Substances Control Act) shall be treated as having been submitted in support of a registration, and the person who submitted the study shall be treated as an original data submitter. Further, for the purposes of section 3(c)(1)(D)(iii), the compensation period for a study generated using the Toxic Substances Control Act shall expire upon the expiration of the reimbursement period provided for in that Act.

Section 405 amends section 3 of the Act by adding a new subsection (i) regarding the substitution of inert ingredients in registered pesticides. The Administrator shall approve an application to amend the registration of a pesticide to substitute an inert ingredient for an inert ingredient listed under section 3(h)(1) if the Administrator finds, on the basis of similarity in molecular structure to a chemical known to cause significant adverse effects, existing data, or such short term tests as the Administrator determines are necessary, that the substitute inert ingredient does not pose the same or similar concerns about unreasonable adverse effects on the environment that resulted in the listing of the original inert ingredient. This provision should ensure that a possibly hazardous priority inert ingredient is not replaced with another inert ingredient with similar concerns and that undue burdens are not imposed on inert ingredient substitution.

Section 406 further amends section 3 by adding a new subsection (j) regarding labeling requirements for certain inert ingredients. Paragraph (1) requires that, not later than thirty (30) days after publication of the final data development plan, the registrant of a pesticide that contains an inert ingredient listed under section 3(h)(1) shall apply for an amended registration of the pesticide to change the label to conform with section 2(g)(2)(A) and (n). It is intended that identification of the inert ingredient on the label shall be limited to the statement of ingredients. The amendment provides further that the Administrator shall act on this application within thirty (30) days after its receipt. Paragraph (2) states that a pesticide, the inert ingredient statement of which does not satify section (2)(n) with respect to a listed inert ingredient, shall not be considered misbranded until one-hundred-twenty (120) days after publication of the data development plan, or the date on which the Administrator approves a registration amendment providing for a change in the label of the pesticide, whichever occurs later.

Section 407 also amends section 3 by adding to the end a new subsection (k) regarding formula statements. Paragraph (1) states that not later than one-hundred-twenty (120) days after initial publication of the priority list, each registrant of a pesticide containing an inert ingredient or ingredients contained on the list shall make any necessary modifications to the formula statement submitted purusant to section 3(c)(1)(E). Paragraph (2) states further that not more than two-hundred-forty (240) days after the initial publication of the priority list, each registrant of a pesticide containing an inert ingredient or ingredients shall make any necessary modifications to the formula statement submitted pursuant to section 3(c)(1)(E). This provision is intended to ensure that EPA has up-to-date and accurate formula statements.

Section 408(a) amends section 10(d)(1)(C) by adding a provision allowing disclosure of listed inert ingredients. This amendment is made by adding at the end of subparagraph (C) the clause "except that the indentity of an inert ingredient listed under section 3(h)(1) shall be disclosed in accordance with paragraph (4)."

Section 408(b) amends section (10)(d) by adding a new paragraph (4) regarding disclosure of inert ingredients. Subparagraph (A) states that the identity of an inert ingredient may be disclosed by the listing of the inert ingredient on the priority list required by section 3(h)(1) and the release of product labels disclosing the identity of an inert ingredient on the priority list. Subparagraph (B) permits the Administrator to continue to require identification of an inert ingredient on the product label after the removal of the ingredient from the priority list if the Administrator has commence an interim administrative review under section 3(c)(8) or issued a notice of cancellation under section 6.

PUBLIC RIGHT TO KNOW

Section 510 amends section 3(c)(1) of the Act by adding two new subparagraphs on additional requirements in registration statements.

Subparagraph (G)(i) requires registrants to submit proposed fact sheets containing the name of the pesticide active ingredient and priority inert ingredients referred to in section 3(h)(1), and a summary of relevant health, safety and environmental data. These fact sheets are intended to be similar in form and substance to the information required in Material Safety Data Sheets under the OSHA hazard communications standard. Clause (ii) requires that, not later than 120 days after the effective date of the Amendments, each registrant of a pesticide active ingredient or pesticide containing an inert ingredient referred to in section 3(h)((1) shall submit to the Administrator the fact sheets. Clause (iii) states that the fact sheets shall be maintained and kept current by the registrant and made available to the public, on request, by the Administrator and the registrant. Finally, clause (iv) allows the Administrator to require amendments to the fact sheets in order to provide accurate and clear information to the public. The amendment will provide the public with clear health and safety information on all active ingredients and priority inert ingredients.

Subparagraph (H)(i) requires registrants to submit with their registration statements a list of locations where their pesticide active ingredient will be produced in the United States. Clause (ii) requires that, not later than 120 days after the effective date of the Amendments, registrants of currently registered active ingredients shall submit the identity of locations where their pesticide active ingredients are produced in the United States. Clause (iii) states that the list is to be maintained and kept current by the registrant and made available to the public, on request, by the Administrator and the registrant.

Section 502(a) amends section 7(d) of the Act regarding confidential records and information, stating that production locations shall be disclosed to the public. This amendment makes it clear that the public may have access to the identity of locations where a pesticide is produced.

Section 502(b) amends section 7 by adding a new subsection (e) regarding the retention of fact sheets. The amendment states that any producer operating an establishment registered under section 7 shall obtain and make available to the public a fact sheet, required to be developed under section 3(c)(1)(G), for each active ingredient and listed inert ingredient used in the establishment.

DATA DISCLOSURE TO STATES

Section 601 amends section 10 by adding a new subsection (h) on data disclosure to States.

Paragraph (1) allows the Administrator to disclose to a State any data or information acquired under the Act if both the State assures the Administrator and the Administrator determines that the owner of the data or information will receive no less protection with respect to the disclosure and use of the data or information by the State than is provided by sections 3 and 10 of the Act.

Paragraph (2) states, for purposes of any action that may lie against the United States for just compensation under 28 U.S.C. Section 1491, the disclosure or use of data or information provided by the Administrator to a State in a manner inconsistent with sections 3 and 10 shall be considered a taking of property and the act of a State with respect to such data or information shall be considered an act of the United States.

CANCELLATION PROCEDURES

Section 701(a) amends section 3(c)(8) of the Act regarding interim administrative reviews.

Subparagraph (A) establishes criteria for the Administrator's initiation of an interim administrative review.

Clauses (i) and (ii) of subparagraph (A) restate current law.

Clause (iii) adds a new provision that the criteria for initiating an interim administrative review shall be established on the basis of levels of risk and may include consideration of currently available exposure data.

Clause (iv) states that the absence of exposure data shall not delay or preclude initiation of an interim administrative review and that the Administrator shall not decline to initiate a review solely on the basis of exposure, unless adequate data on all relevant means of exposure have been considered.

Clause (v) provides that, on receipt of data demonstrating to the Administrator that the review triggers are exceeded, the Administrator shall immediately notify all registrants of the pesticide and provide the registrants with appropriate information and explanation of the manner in which the trigger has been exceeded.

Clause (vi) states that, not later than 30 days after receipt of the notice, a registrant may respond to the notice.

Finally, clause (vii) provides that not later than 30 days after the Administrator receives a response from the registrant, the Administrator shall determine whether an interim administrative review of the pesticide shall be initiated.

Subparagraph (B) establishes the procedures for the interim administrative review.

Clause (i) of subparagraph (B) states that notice of an interim administrative review shall be provided to all registrants and interested members of the public and shall be published in the Federal Register.

Clause (ii) states that the notice shall give the basis for the review, indicate availability of all data on which the position of the Administrator is based, and include a request for additional data needed for the review.

Clause (iii) states that, not later than 90 days after publication of the notice, comments may be submitted.

Clause (iv) allows not more than 90 days after the close of the comment period for the Administrator to review all comments and additional data submitted and publish a proposed regulatory position.

Clause (v) states that, not later than 45 days after the close of the initial comment period, additional comments may be submitted to the Administrator to address comments filed by other parties.

Clause (vi) states that the Administrator's proposed regulatory position shall be submitted to the Scientific Advisory Panel at its next scheduled meeting for comment solely on relevant scientific issues and that the public may submit comments to the Panel concerning the Administrator's proposed position. The clause also provides that the Scientific Advisory Panel shall issue a report on the proposed position not later than 30 days after its meeting, the Administrator review and consider the report of the Panel and, not later than 60 days after receipt of the report, the Administrator issue a final regulatory decision whether to retain, restrict, or cancel the uses of the pesticide.

Clause (vii) requires the Administrator to make a final decision with one year of initiation of the review.

Clause (viii) states that the time limits specified for conducting the special review may not be extended, except in exceptional circumstances in which additional data critical to a fair and accurate determination of the risks are required, the extension is limited to the time required to obtain the additional data on expedited basis and no event to exceed one year, and the Administrator acted to obtain the additional data at the time the interim administrative review was initiated.

Section 701(b) amends section 25(d) regarding the Scientific Advisory Panel. An insertion at the beginning of the subsection avoids duplicate referrals to the Panel when the interim administrative review is followed by a section 6 hearing.

Section 701(c) states that the amendments made in section 3(c)(8), relating to interim administrative reviews, shall apply only to reviews initiated after January 1, 1986.

Section 702 amends section 6(b) of the Act regarding cancellation and change in classification of pesticide registrations.

Paragraph (1)(A) repeats the provisions of the current Act, establishing the criteria and requirements for the Administrator's notice of intent to cancel or change in the classification of pesticide.

Subparagraph (B) adds a new provision that the Administrator may require changes to the labelling of a pesticide by informal rulemaking, unless the changes are equivalent to a cancellation of use, render the product unmarketable or otherwise have a major economic impact on the product. In such circumstances, the changes shall be subject to the hearing procedure set forth in section 6. The label changes issued through informal rulemaking shall not be effective pending any judicial review requested under section 16 after a final order of the Administrator.

Subparagraphs (C), (E), (F) and (G) track current law, regarding the time requirements and other procedures followed in the notice.

Subparagraph (D) adds a requirement that the notice include the findings and conclusions the Administrator uses in support of the proposed action.

Paragraph (2) provides procedures for the conduct of the hearing.

Subparagraph (A) restates requirements of the current law.

Subparagraph (B) provides that, when a request for a hearing is made, the request shall identify with particularity the findings and conclusions of the decision of the Administrator that are disputed and include a complete statement of the reasons and factual basis that support the request for the hearing.

Subparagraph (C) states that another party to the proceeding may also identify findings and conclusions in dispute.

Subparagraph (D) restates current law.

Paragraph (3) repeats the factors under current law that the Administrator shall consider in taking any action under the subsection.

Section 703 of the Amendments deletes in section 6(d) the referral of matters to the National Academy of Sciences and requires the Administrator to complete a section 6 hearing, not preceded by an interim administrative review, within 12 months after issuance of the notice that gave rise to the hearing.

Section 704 amends section 6 by adding a new subsection (g) on the procedures for a hearing following an interim administrative review.

Paragraph (g)(1) of the new subsection states that, if a hearing is held following an interim administrative review, the procedures set forth in section 6(b) and (d) shall be modified in accordance with new subsection (g).

Paragraph (2) allows any person who is adversely affected by decision of the Administrator following an interim administrative review to request a hearing within 30 days of such decision.

Paragraph (3) confirms the right of any person to seek judicial review of the Administrator's failure to make a decision within the time required.

Paragraph (4) established the procedures to be followed in a hearing following interim administrative review. At the request of a party, a hearing examiner may receive into evidence portions of the interim administrative review record that the party demonstrates are relevant and material to the disputed issues. The right of other parties to confront and cross-examine the evidence shall be preserved with respect to material issues of adjudicative fact, so long as the cross-examination is not unduly repetitious. Not later than 60 days afte the hearing examiner is appointed, pre-hearing matters shall be completed and the hearing commence. Further, not later than 30 days before the hearing commences, the parties shall exchange witness lists and exhibits to be offered at the hearing. Paragraph (4) also states that if studies become available that were not considered during the administrative review, the hearing examiner may, on request of any party and when in the examiner's judgment it is necessary, submit the studies to the Scientific Advisory Panel for supplemental comment on an expedited basis. The Panel review shall not extend the time for completion of the hearing. The hearing examiner must schedule the presentation and examination of witnesses in the hearing so that the presentation of evidence is completed within 60 days, except that the schedule should not prejudice the right of a party to present evidence. The parties shall submit briefs within 20 days of receiving a transcript of the hearing and the hearing examiner shall render a recommended decision within 20 days of submission of the briefs. The paragraph states that the hearing shall be completed within 6 months of the issuance of the notice that gave rise to the hearing. Further, the time limits imposed by the subsection may not be extended, except in exceptional circumstances when it is essential for a fair and accurate determination of pivotal facts central to the proceeding, and in no event to exceed 180 days.

FALSE OR INVALID DATA

Section 801 amends section 6 by adding a new subsection (h) regarding cancellation of registrations based on false or invalid data.

Paragraph (1) requires that the Administrator shall immediately issue a notice of intent to suspend and to cancel the registration of a pesticide if, prior to the effective date of the Amendments, the Administrator has previously determined in the Industrial Biotest validation process that data submitted by registrant in support of the registration were invalid, have not been replaced or have not been submitted by April 1, 1988 under a schedule approved by the Administrator, and are material to the registration.

Paragraph (2) states that after the effective date of the Amendments, if the Administrator determines that invalid data have been submitted by a registrant in support of a registration, the Administrator may either (A) require the registrant to submit valid replacement studies or data on expedited schedule and to submit interim progress report, or (B) issue a notice of intent to cancel the registration if such action would be in the public interest, taking into account the scope of the invalid data and the need to use the data to determine whether the pesticide may cause unreasonable adverse effects on the environment. This section does not address "routine" outstanding data requirements, where the quality of health and safety studies does not comply with current requirements or guidelines. Rather, its purpose is to permit the Administrator to take action on registrations in any future circumstances, such as occurred with IBT, where the Agency discovers that pivotal studies, previously thought to be valid in justifying a product's registration, are in fact invalid and the continued use of the product may cause an unreasonable risk.

Paragraph (3) states that, if a registrant willfully submits material data known to be false in support of the registration of a pesticide, the Administrator shall immediately issue a notice of intent to suspend and cancel the registration.

Paragraph (4) establishes procedures for hearings on the cancellation or suspension of registrations based on false or invalid data.

Subparagraph (A) states that any suspension or cancellation under section 6(h) shall become final and effective at the end of the 30 day period beginning on receipt by the registrant of a notice issued under the section unless, during the 30 day period, a request for a hearing is made by a person adversely affected.

Subparagraph (B) requires that the hearing shall be conducted in accordance with section 6(c) or (d), as appropriate.

Subparagraph (C) states that the only matters for resolution at a hearing under paragraph (1), regarding data involving the Industrial Biotest validation process, shall be whether data previously determined by the Administrator to be invalid have not been replaced or are being replaced and the completed studies have not been submitted to the Administrator by April 1, 1988, are in response to a notice of the Administrator issued under section 3(c)(2)(B) or other formal notice, and are material to the registration.

Subparagraph (D) states that the only matters for resolution at a hearing conducted pursuant to paragraph (2), regarding data determined subsequent to the Amendments to be invalid, shall be whether data are invalid, material, and necessary to adequately determine whether a pesticide may cause unreasonable adverse effects on the environment.

Subparagraph (E) states that the only matters for resolution at a hearing conducted pursuant to paragraph (3), regarding data determined to be false, shall be whether a registrant willfully submitted material data known to be false.

Subparagraph (F) adds that the decision shall be final after completion of the hearing.

Subsection (6) states that, notwithstanding any other provision of the Act, a hearing shall be held and a determination made within 75 days after receipt of a request for a hearing.

Section 802 amends section 12(a)(2) regarding unlawful acts. Paragraphs (1) and (2) make technical changes. Paragraph (3) adds at the end of section 12(a)(2) a new subparagraph (Q), making an unlawful act to willfully falsify all or part of any data submitted pursuant to the Act or to willfully submit such data knowing it to be false.

INSPECTION OF LABORATORIES

Section 901 amends section 9(a) by adding a new paragraph after the first paragraph of the subsection. The amendment states that, for purposes of verifying the accuracy of data submitted in support of an experimental use permit or registration, an officer or employee duly designated by the Administrator is authorized, after the submission of an application for an experimental use permit or registration, to enter at reasonable times any laboratory to inspect relevant parts of the laboratory, related books and records, and data that have been or are being developed in support of the application. The amendment states further that the Administrator shall coordinate inspections with actions taken under other Federal laws for the purpose of avoiding duplication of inspections.

EXPORT OF PESTICIDES

Section 1001 amends section 2(q)(1) regarding the definition of "misbranded." Paragraphs (1) and (2) make certain technical amendments. Paragraph (3) adds at the end of section 2(q)(1) a new subparagraph (I). The amendment states that a product is misbranded, in the case of a pesticide intended for export that is substantially similar in composition and use pattern to a pesticide registered under section 3, if the label does not contain the same health, safety, and hazard precautions as a pesticide registered under section 3, unless such precautions on the label are in conflict with the law of the importing country. It is intended that a conflict means a direct conflict in which the foreign law does not permit inclusion of the information on the label.

Section 1002 amends section 2 by adding at the end a new subsection (gg) defining the term "importing country". The amendment states that the term "importing country" means the first country to which a pesticide, device, or active ingredient, subject to the notification requirement of section 17(a), is exported from the United States.

Section 1003 amends section 8(a) by inserting the terms "and exporters" after the term "producers". This change clarifies the Administrator's authority to regulate the records of pesticide exporters.

Section 1004(a) amends section 17(a) regarding pesticides and devices intended for export. The amendment is as follows:

Paragraph (1) restates current provisions of the law and adds references to sections of the Act to which a pesticide, device, or active ingredient used in producing a pesticide intended solely for export to a foreign country shall apply. The new sections added are sections 2(q)(1)(I), and 17(a) (2), (3), (4), (5), and (6). The current provision in the Act is deleted that requires foreign purchasers to sign a statement acknowledging that the exported pesticide is not registered for use in the United States and cannot be sold in the United States.

Paragraph (2)(A) states that paragraph (2) applies to pesticides, devices, or active ingredients—

(i) for which a restricted use classification has become effective under section 3,

(ii) for which a cancellation or suspension has beome effective under section 6,

(iii) for which the registration has been voluntarily withdrawn by the registrant, if the withdrawal was associated with concern over potential adverse public health or environmental effects, or

(iv) which is not registered under section 3 for any use.

Subparagraph (B) states that no pesticide, device, or active ingredient identified in subparagraph (I) may be exported to any foreign country unless the person has provided a notification. An exporter must, at least 30 days prior to the first shipment each year into the importing country, have—

(i) notified the person importing the pesticide and the appropriate government regulatory office in the importing country,

(ii) received written evidence that the notification was delivered to the appropriate government regulatory office, and

(iii) submitted a copy of the notification in English and evidence of delivery of the notice to the Administrator. This notice requirement does not require prior informed consent of the importing country; however, it does require the exporter to receive written evidence that the notification was delivered. Normally, such evidence would be a recipient's signature indicating delivery, a receipt, or a telex answer back form. Where such evidence is not available, the exporter could obtain evidence of delivery through written certification of delivery by the deliverer.

Finally, subparagraph (C) states that the notification shall be made available to the public, on request. Such disclosure shall be consistent with section 10.

Paragraph (3) states what the notification shall contain. The requirements are identified in subparagraphs (A) through (F) and include the name of the pesticide, common and chemical names of the active ingredient, name and address of the person exporting the pesticide, name and address of the person importing the pesticide, statement of the reasons why the pesticide was cancelled, suspended, voluntarily withdrawn, not registered in the United States, or classified for restricted use, and other information.

Paragraph (4) adds a new requirement for labels on exported pesticides. Subparagraph (A) states that the label of pesticides intended for export from the United States shall be written in an appropriate language. Subparagraph (B) states that, except as provided in section 2(q)(1)(H), such labels may not refer to compliance with the laws of the United States unless the label also contains or is accompanied by a description of the relevant requirements of such laws.

Section 1004(b) establishes the effective dates of actions under section 17.

Paragraph (1) requires that section 17(a)(2) and (3) shall become effective 90 days after enactment of the Amendments.

Paragraph (2) requires that, not later than 30 days after enactment of the Amendments, the Administrator shall publish in the Federal Register a list of the names, addresses, and the international telecommunications codes of appropriate regulatory officials required to receive notices under section 17(a)(2)(B).

Paragraph (3) requires that, not later than 180 days after enactment of the Amendments and annually thereafter, the Administrator shall revise the list of regulatory offices of importing countries designated to receive notices.

Paragraph (4) requires that, not later than 90 days after enactment of the Amendments, the Administrator shall publish in the Federal Register preliminary guidelines on the form of the notification, translation of the notification and labels required under section 17(a), retention of shipping documents and other pertinent records by exporters, and the procedures for public access to documents submitted by exporters.

Paragraph (5) states that, not later than one year after enactment of the Amendments, the Administrator shall issue regulations necessary to carry out section 17(a)(2) and (3), regarding the notification requirements.

Section 1005 amends section 17(b) of the Act to expand the scope and frequency of cancellation notices furnished to foreign governments and appropriate international agencies by the United States. The Administrator shall transmit through the Department of State a notice at such time and annually thereafter whenever a pesticide registration, or a cancellation or suspension of the registration, becomes effective or ceases to be effective, or a pesticide is classified for restricted use. The contents of such notification shall include the reasons for the regulatory action taken and, for cancelled or suspended registrations, information concerning other pesticides that are registered under section 3 and that could be used in lieu of the pesticide.

Section 1006 amends section 17(d) to provide greater cooperation by the United States in international efforts on pesticide regulation.

Paragraph (1) requires the Administrator, in cooperation with the Department of State, other appropriate Federal agencies and non-governmental and international organizations, to actively participate in international efforts to develop and improve pesticide research and regulatory programs.

Paragraph (2) states that the Administrator shall provide foreign countries with technical assistance to develop comprehensive pesticide regulatory programs.

Paragraph (3) states that, within one year of the effective date of the amendments and every three years thereafter, the Administrator shall conduct and publish a survey of all countries that import pesticides from the United States or from which the United States imports agricultural commodities, to ascertain what procedures exist in each country regarding the registration, labelling, and training to ensure safe handling, transportation, application and disposal of pesticides, and control residues on foods in order to meet tolerances established under United States law.

Paragraph (4) requires the Administrator to report to Congress annually on the activities conducted to comply with section 17(d) and the results.

Section 1007 adds a new subsection (f) to section 17. The new subsection requires the Administrator to take certain action on tolerances for agricultural commodities that have been cancelled, suspended, denied, or voluntarily withdrawn (unless any such action was due solely to environmental effects).

Paragraph (1) requires the Administrator, within 60 days after such regulatory action, to revoke or amend the corresponding tolerance or exemption from tolerance established under section 408 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, and any food additive regulation established under section 409 of that law.

Paragraph (2) states that the Administrator may amend the tolerance only to permit food in commerce that contains residues of the pesticide from previously registered uses, from foreign or United States use of existing stocks permitted under section 6(a), or from unavoidable residual environmental contamination.

Paragraph (3) provides that the Administrator shall promptly lower any amended tolerance as soon as the residues decrease.

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS

Section 1101 amends section 31 to appropriate sufficient funds to implement the Act, as amended, for four (4) years.

EMPLOYEE PROTECTION

Section 1201 adds a new section 32 on employee protection.

Subsection (a) states that no employer may discharge or otherwise discriminate against any employee with respect to the employee's compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment because the employee (or person acting by a request of the employee) has commenced, caused, or is about to commence a proceeding under the Act, testified or is about to testify, or assisted or participated, or is about to assist or participate, in any manner in a proceeding or action furthering the purposes of the Act.

Subsection (b) requires the Administrator to implement section 32 in a manner consistent with the procedures, remedies, review, enforcement, and exclusion provisions of section 23 of the Toxic Substances Control Act, an identical provision to section 32 of the Amendment.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

Section 1301 makes certain technical amendments required by changes to the Act.

INTRODUCTION OF THE HEALTH CARE QUALITY IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1986

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce a bill to reduce medical malpractice in this country, the Health Care Quality Improvement Act of 1986.

Of special significance is the fact that, for the first time, the American Association of Retired Persons, the American Medical Association, and the American Hospital Association have come together to work with me on this bill and are behind this effort to curb the medical malpractice problem.

Medical malpractice is bad for all Americans. For consumers it has meant higher health care bills and greater risks as doctors practice more defensive medicine and subject consumers to more tests and procedures. If you are a medical patient, it can present the ultimate question—life or death.

There is no quick fix for the malpractice problem. But a good place to start is with the medical profession itself. Doctors are in the best position to do something about malpractice—because they see it happening around them. Most doctors are honest, hard-working, competent professionals. What's needed are new systems that encourage doctors to bring cases of incompetence to disciplinary authorities.

The present system can penalize those doctors who blow the whistle on a colleague they believe is malpracticing. In Astoria, OR where the physicians of a clinic reviewed another doctor's surgical competence, the doctor sued them. This suit, where restraint of trade was charged, resulted in a $2 million damage award for the plaintiff doctor.

Regardless of the guilt or innocence of the Astoria doctor, cases like this demonstrate that if this country wants physicians to come forward and prevent truly bad doctors from hurting people, there must be legal protection for them from the possibility of multimillion-dollar litigation, years in court and financial ruin.

That's exactly what the Health Care Quality Improvement Act would provide. Under this act, if a physician peer review committee makes a good faith determination that a member of its hospital's medical staff is incompetent, and the committee removes the malpracticing physician from the medical staff, the members of the committee receive legal protections for that action.

In addition, my legislation creates new tools to prevent incompetent doctors from repeatedly endangering the health of our citizens.

For the first time, a national data bank would be established to give hospitals information about the malpractice track record of those doctors who apply to practice on their staffs. Hospitals would be required to check the data bank before permitting a physician to practice in the hospital and when reviewing a physician's privileges. Through the provisions of this bill, we can stop incompetent doctors from moving to work in a new area of the country while keeping a record of malpractice secret.

The need for this legislation is clear. In the past decade, the number of malpractice claims has tripled to an average of 900 per day. The amount of money awarded has grown. The average award now is in excess of $100,000 and awards of more than $1 million are common.

If the growing malpractice problem is not reversed, this country's ability to provide affordable, quality health care could be crippled.

In the past, the response to the malpractice problem has been to play the "blame grame." One group says it is another's fault, and instead of solutions we have gridlock. The approach taken in this bill is grounded in consensus, not finger pointing. Its purpose it to provide physicians and hospitals with tools to reduce malpractice. And I expect the medical profession to use these new tools to the fullest extent possible.

EAGLE SCOUT WILLIAM R. O'CONNELL

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues the achievements of a fine young man in my district, William R. O'Connell. Recently, William was honored for achieving the highest rank in Scouting, that of Eagle Scout.

The path to Eagle Scout is truly a long and difficult one. It requires an extraordinary amount of dedication and determination not usually seen in youths of this age. The tasks which must be completed to become an Eagle Scout cover virtually every realm of human experience. Some require intellectual and creative abilities while others call for physical agility and strength. Some tasks help integrate the young man into society through community action that benefits his neighborhood and world. Still other acts are performed alone intended to develop internal growth and maturity. Always, however, is the challenge to set and strive for goals through initiative and diligence.

Young men like William are leaders. The achievement of Eagle Scout is likely to be only the beginning of a future full of accomplishments. For this young man has shown that he can perform exceptionally well without a compelling hand of authority over him. I say this not to downplay the importance of the encouragement he received from his family and Scout leaders but, rather, to assert the independence and self-motivation he has already shown.

Your achievement of becoming an Eagle Scout is praised and applauded. It is with sincere pleasure that I commend you, William O'Connell, before my fellow Members in Congress.

THE FEDERAL RADIOACTIVE WASTE LIABILITY ACT OF 1986

HON. SID MORRISON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, just a few months ago I introduced legislation to make the Federal Government liable for accidents involving the disposal of nuclear waste. At that time a few colleagues rallied around to support the concept, but most thought I was crazy to stick my neck out in support of total compensation.

Today, I don't have to stand alone in my support of full compensation. My colleagues have come to realize the fairness and simplicity of this approach. Today I can stand up in support of this concept with Congressman AL SWIFT—a respected Member of Congress who has shown great leadership and knowledge on this subject—and introduce a refined version of that first bill.

This bill, the Federal Radioactive Waste Liability Act of 1986, addresses a troubling concern voiced by the States now involved in the site selection process for disposal of radioactive waste. That concern simply expressed is: "Who has liability in the event of an accident and for how much?" The bill we are introducing today is intended to clarify this ambiguity by putting the brunt of the responsibility where it belongs—squarely on the Federal Government. Our bill accomplishes this objective by making two fundamental changes in present law.

First, the Price-Anderson Act is amended to eliminate the current $500 million liability ceiling for those Federal contractors engaged in nuclear waste disposal activities. This limited notion of liability is unacceptable to the States and affected parties. In my mind, it is irresponsible for the Federal Government not to accept strict liability and provide full compensation when they are taking title to radioactive materials.

Second, the bill sets up a two-tier system for payment of liability claims. The initial source for payment of liability claims—up to $5 billion—will be the nuclear waste trust fund. This fund represents a ready pool of cash for paying claims. The second tier for compensation will be the Secretary's already existing authority to issue Treasury bonds. Together these two tiers will provide full compensation in a timely and fair manner.

I hope this legislation will provide a starting point for the Federal Government and affected States to work out in a cooperative fashion this area of disagreement.

H.R.—

A bill to amend the Price-Anderson provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 to establish liability and indemnification for nuclear incidents arising out of Federal storage, disposal, and related transportation of radioactive waste

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as "The Federal Radioactive Waste Liability Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the Federal Government currently does not, but should, assume the responsibility to provide total indemnification for public liability claims arising out of nuclear incidents relating to Federal storage, disposal, and related transportation of radioactive waste; and

(2) such indemnification should be made part from amounts available through the Nuclear Waste Fund established in section 302 of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10222).

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to amend the Price-Anderson provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2011 et seq.) to ensure that the Federal Government assumes the responsibility to provide, in part through the use of the Nuclear Waste Fund, total indemnification for public liability claims arising out of nuclear incidents relating to Federal storage, disposal and related transportation of radioactive waste.

(c) NATIONAL POLICY.—The Congress hereby declares it to be the national policy of the United States to provide full compensation, founded upon liability without fault, to all persons and entities entitled to such compensation as a result of nuclear incidents relating to radioactive waste to which the United States holds title.

SEC. 3. FEDERAL RADIOACTIVE WASTE LIABILITY AND INDEMNIFICATION.

Section 170 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2210) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"q. FEDERAL RADIOACTIVE WASTE LIABILITY.—

"(1) INDEMNIFICATION AGREEMENTS.—The Secretary of Energy (hereafter referred to in this subsection as the "Secretary") shall enter into agreements of indemnification with each contractor of the Secretary carrying out any contractual activity with respect to radioactive waste, including transportation, treatment, storage, and disposal, to which the United States holds title. In such agreements of indemnification, the Secretary shall, notwithstanding the provisions of subsection e., indemnify the persons indemnified against claims for public liability for nuclear incidents arising out of or in connection with any such contractual activity. Each indemnification agreement entered into by the Secretary pursuant to this subsection shall, as to all activities of the contractor covered by the agreement, include the provisions authorized for incorporation in indemnification agreements by subsection n.

"(2) NONCONTRACTUAL ACTIVITIES OF SECRETARY.—For purposes of any activity that is undertaken by the Secretary with respect to radioactive waste to which the United States holds title and that is not undertaken by contract, the Secretary shall be considered to be a contractor with whom an agreement of indemnification has been entered into under this subsection.

"(3) PAYMENT.—The Secretary shall make all payments required under an agreement of indemnification entered into under this subsection. Such payments shall be made as follows:

"(A) NUCLEAR WASTE FUND.—The first $5,000,000,000 of payments arising from any one nuclear incident arising from the implementation of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10101 et seq.) shall be made from amounts in the Nuclear Waste Fund established in section 302 of such Act (42 U.S.C. 10222). The payment of claims under this subparagraph shall not be subject to subsection (d), or the penultimate sentence of subsection (e)(2), of such section 302. If sufficient amounts are not available in the Nuclear Waste Fund to expeditiously pay valid claims made under this subsection, the Secretary shall exercise the authority provided in subsections (a)(4) and (e)(5) of such section 302.

"(B) BORROWING AUTHORITY.—For the purposes of paying claims arising from any one nuclear incident which either (1) arises out of activities other than the implementation of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10101 et seq.), or (2) arises out of the implementation of such Act but exceeds the amount set forth in subparagraph (A), the Secretary shall issue to the Secretary of the Treasury obligations in such forms and denominations, bearing such maturities, and subject to such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the Secretary and the Secretary of the Treasury. Such obligations shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury by taking into consideration the average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations to the United States of comparable maturities during the month preceding the issuance of the obligations under this subparagraph. The Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase any issued obligation, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury may use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under chapter 31 of title 31, United States Code, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such chapter are extended to include any purchase of such obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any obligation acquired by the Secretary of the Treasury under this subparagraph. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of obligations under this subparagraph shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States."

SEC. 4. PRECAUTIONARY STATE ACTIVITIES.

(a) LIABILITY OF FEDERAL CONTRACTORS.—Section 11 w. of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2014(w)) is amended by inserting after "nuclear incident" the first place it appears the following: "or, in the case of an indemnity agreement entered into under section 170 q., a precautionary State activity".

(b) DEFINITION.—Section 11 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2014) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"dd. The term 'precautionary State activity' means an action taken by a state or local government official to evacuate the public residing in the vicinity of (a) a production of utilization facility, or (b) a disposal or storage facility or transportation route for spent nuclear fuel, high-level radioactive waste, or transuranic waste, and other appropriate emergency response action, which is deemed necessary to protect the public health and safety from real or imminent danger, or threat thereof, arising from a nuclear incident associated with (a) or (b)."

SEC. 5. APPLICABILITY OF WAIVER OF DEFENSES REQUIREMENT TO LIABILITY FOR FEDERAL RADIOACTIVE WASTE ACTIVITIES.

Section 170 n. (1) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2210(n)(1)) is amended—

(1) by redesignating subparagraphs (a), (b), and (c) as subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C), respectively;

(2) by striking out "or" at the end of subparagraphs (A) and (B); and

(3) by inserting after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

"(D) arises out of, results from, or occurs in the course of, any activity undertaken by the Secretary of Energy (or under contract with the Secretary of Energy) with respect to radioactive waste to which the United States holds title,".

THE FEDERAL RADIOACTIVE WASTE LIABILITY ACT OF 1986, MARCH 12, 1986

GENERAL DESCRIPTION

Amends the Atomic Energy Act to establish strict Federal liability for nuclear incidents that arise from the transportation, treatment, storage or disposal of radioactive waste to which the United States holds title; and to assure that persons damaged thereby are fully compensated.

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

Sec. 1. Short title

This Act may be cited as "The Federal Radioactive Waste Liability Act of 1986."

Sec. 2. Findings and purpose

The Congress finds that the Federal government should assume responsibility for total indemnification for public liability claims arising out of nuclear incidents involving Federal radioactive waste; and that a portion of such indemnification should come from the Nuclear Waste Fund. The purpose and policy of the Act is to effectuate the same.

Sec. 3. Federal radioactive waste liability and indemnification

Sec. 170 of the Atomic Energy Act (the Price-Anderson Act) is amended by adding a new subsection "q" at the end thereof.

Para. (1). Indemnification agreements

The Secretary of Energy shall enter into indemnification agreements with contractors involved in Federal radioactive waste activities. These contracts shall not be subject to the limitations on liability found in subsection "e" of the Price-Anderson Act. The waiver of defenses in Sec. 5 would apply to any nuclear incidents involving Federal radioactive waste.

Para. 2. Noncontractual agreements

For any radioactive waste activities that the Secretary undertakes without a contractual agreement, the Secretary shall be considered the contractor and thereby subject to the provisions of this legislation.

Para. 3. Payment

The first $5 billion of payments resulting from a single nuclear incident shall be made from the Nuclear Waste Fund. To trigger payments from the Nuclear Waste Fund the incident must occur as a result of implementation of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982. Should the incident be a result of other activities, or if the payment exceeds $5 billion, payments shall be made by the Secretary with funds raised through the issuance of Treasury obligations.

Sec. 4. Precautionary State activities

State and local governments shall be reimbursed for costs associated with evacuating the public or with carrying out appropriate emergency response actions when these activities are necessary to protect the public from real or imminent danger or the threat of such danger.

Sec. 5. Waiver of defenses

Adds radioactive waste activities to the instances under which defenses are waived in the event of an extraordinary nuclear occurrence.

A TRIBUTE TO MARGUERITE CHANDLER AND EDYTHE GUTMAN

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, the National Association of Social Workers has declared March, "Social Workers Month." With this in mind, I wish to bring to the attention of the House of Representatives the outstanding work of Marguerite Chandler and Edythe Gutman, who have been respectively nominated as "Citizen of the Year" and "Social Worker of the Year" by the New Jersey chapter of the association.

Each of these women have unselfishly served their communities and are model citizens. Edythe Gutman has served as president of many important organizations in the large municipality of East Brunswick, NJ, including the board of education, commission on aging, and youth services commission. She has also worked on numerous projects which have benefited hundreds of teenagers and involved working in cooperation with numerous township agencies and officials. While it is not possible to adequately summarize Edythe's contribution over 36 years of dedicated community service, the above offers brief insight into her character and her concern for her fellowman.

Similarly, Marguerite Chandler has been equally devoted in her service to those in need. She is the founder and president of the Food Bank Network of Somerset County and Aid to Friends, programs which assist the elderly, handicapped, and homeless. Her energy and generous outreach serve as a model and inspiration for all who wish to help the poor and less fortunate.

New Jersey and my congressional district are indeed lucky to have two such gracious ladies. Their volunteerism epitomize the spirit that helped build this great land. I applaud these women for their leadership, sensitivity, organizational skills and drive, which have helped to benefit so many. I wish them all the best for the future as well.

A TRIBUTE TO RETIRING POCOMOKE CITY MAYOR J. DAWSON CLARKE

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, it comes as a great honor for me to pay tribute to a gentleman whose vim, vigor, and vision has brought great bounty to Pocomoke City, MD. I speak of J. Dawson Clarke, who, as mayor of Pocomoke for the past 18 years, has mixed charisms and compassion to enrich the lives of the citizenry he so proudly serves.

When I look at the life and times of J. Dawson Clarke, I see a man who captures the very essence of what we hope for in a public personage. A diligent and dedicated man, driven by a restless pioneering spirit and an eternal optimism, Mayor Clarke has committed himself to seeing Pocomoke live up to its claim of being the "friendliest town on the Eastern Shore."

During Mayor Clarke's tenure in office, Pocomoke has become a paradigm of progress and prosperity. In fact, Pocomoke's Sunshine Village Apartments, the Pocomoke Area Medical Center, and the downtown revitalization project resulted in Pocomoke being selected as one of 17 finalists in the 1985 All-America Cities competition. This remarkable achievement stands as a towering testament to Mayor Clarke, City Manager Russell Blake, and to untold others who believe in the power of community action.

If Mayor Clarke's public agenda has been ambitious, his personal interests have been extraordinary. Hailing from Dover, DE, Mayor Clarke first carved his niche in Pocomoke in 1927 as the city's cultural cause celebre, playing live piano to the latest showing silent films. Thus began an enduring affection for the theatre for Mayor Clarke, who, along with his wife Hattie, has owned and operated Pocomoke's sole movie house for over half a century.

Mayor Clarke is also widely known on the Eastern Shore for his 25 years of inspired, innovative and informative live radio work for WBOC in Salisbury. Just as with his movie house, Mayor Clarke's radio show has brought great joy and happiness to countless citizens across the Eastern Shore.

Never content to rest upon the laurels of past achievement, Mayor Clarke has given his time and energy to an array of causes—all with a view toward improving the quality of life for the people he so faithfully serves. Among the many notable positions Mayor Clarke has held, is the presidency of the Rotary Club, the presidency of the Lower-Eastern Shore Mayor's Association and the vice-presidency of Maryland's Municipal League. The mayor has also devoted himself to work in historic preservation on the Spirit of Newton Committee, as well as to promoting growth in business through the Maryland Chamber of Commerce.

Mayor Clarke is truly a man of the people. Ever accessible, the mayor has long cut a striking figure on the city sidewalks of Pocomoke, making his daily rounds so as to lend an ear and offer a hand to concerned townfolk. Even on Sundays, as fellow members of Pitts Creek Presbyterian Church begin to make their way home, Mayor Clarke can be found doing what he does so well—listening, learning, and leading the way to a constructive course of action.

As J. Dawson Clarke approaches his retirement, he will be leaving behind a rich and enduring legacy. One that is a source of great pride to his family, friends, and the many people whose lives he has touched. The mayor has shown us all, that one person can indeed make a difference.

So, Mr. Speaker, I proudly salute Pocomoke City Mayor J. Dawson Clarke—a man who by daring to dream, by demanding the most of himself and of others, looms large in the lore of one shining city on a hill.

BILL KASTRIN'S PIONEERING APPROACH TO UNITED STATES-MEXICO RELATIONS

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues the untiring efforts on behalf of United States-Mexico relations of one of the most distinguished leading citizens of El Paso, TX, William J. Kastrin.

Long before anyone in Washington recognized the urgency of improved United States-Mexico relations and the importance of trade agreements between us, Bill Kastrin had begun his lifelong effort to bring together business and political leaders from both countries to promote joint economic development of the borderlands region. His constant theme has been to stress the importance of sitting down together on both sides of the border and talking about mutual problems and mutual opportunities. In this regard, I look to him as one of my mentors in the development of a modern approach to United States-Mexico relations.

This new approach begun by Bill Kastrin with American and Mexican leaders in El Paso has been embodied in numerous pieces of legislation, including a bill I first introduced in 1983 calling for a comprehensive United States-Mexico trade summit. When compared to the frequent lack of a real dialog between our two countries, Bill Kastrin's efforts to solve mutual problems by face-to-face negotiations at every level of business, labor, and government has provided a ray of hope between two peoples.

Bill Kastrin's pioneering approach to United States-Mexico relations is one with which I have tried to educate the administration, the United States Congress, the media, and the varied and diverse interest groups in Washington, DC, that have a voice in this issue. This approach is the foundation of the philosophy of the bipartisan congressional border caucus, which I founded in 1983 to give border communities like El Paso and the Sixteenth Congressional District a voice in the congressional and legislative process where one had not existed before. The caucus has achieved a string of legislative and policy successes in the last 2 years, due in no small part to this founding philosophy of mutual respect and emphasis on discussion and negotiation.

Bill Kastrin's contributions are of course not limited to the field of United States-Mexico relations. A major force in the El Paso construction and manufacturing community, he currently serves as chairman of the board of Southwestern Sheet Metal Works, Inc., which is the third largest sheet metal products manufacturer in the country. He has played a leading role in attracting local and international investors to the El Paso area, and has made significant contributions to El Paso's present and future economic development.

On Thursday, March 20, 1986, Bill Kastrin will be honored by the 23d Humanitarian Award Dinner sponsored by the National Conference of Christians and Jews. I am proud to bring to the attention of my colleagues and the United States Congress the many and ongoing accomplishments of Bill Kastrin in industry, civic affairs, and perhaps most significantly, to the relationship between the countries of the United States and Mexico. His philosophy of negotiation, which he bases on mutual respect and trust, is a tremendous example of how a private sector individual can have a profound impact on the course of public policy through the power of his idea, and I join the people of El Paso in this most fitting tribute.

TRIBUTE TO MRS. MARTHA BIGGERSTAFF JONES

HON. ELWOOD HILLIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to one of the most outstanding schoolteachers ever to walk into an Indiana classroom. Mrs. Martha Biggerstaff Jones, who taught thousands of students in her 25 years of teaching in Wabash, was honored recently by her friends and neighbors as the recipient of the Wabash Distinguished Citizen Award. I would like to join in congratulating her for this achievement which is a recognition of her years of service to the community.

At the Wabash Area Chamber of Commerce banquet, former students remembered her with fondness and gratitude. "She prepared her students for a more enriched life," one said. "Oh how she prepared."

Her life beyond the classroom is a story of the love she has for Wabash. Mrs. Jones contributed her time and talents to the Wabash Carnegie Public Library Board, the Symphony Board, Arts Council, Dance Theatre, Historical Society, and the Wabash Winterfest. She was a leader in establishing a historical record of the county hospital and instrumental in the publication of the history of Wabash County during our Nation's Bicentennial.

I think all of us had a favorite teacher from our childhood who touched our lives and inspired us to excel. For hundreds of students who attended Linlawn and Wabash high schools and Wabash Junior High School, that teacher was Martha Jones.

HONORING GEORGE GABRIEL

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend George Gabriel, who lives in Lehigh Valley of Pennsylvania. On April 5, Lehigh chapter No. 60 of AHEPA is honoring George, and I want to add my sincere appreciation for the role he has played in the community.

George has been active on the local, State, and national political scene for several years and he is one of the Lehigh Valley's great human assets. George represents the best when it comes to integrity and leadership.

He has served in every capacity including the presidency in the Lehigh Valley chapter No. 60 of AHEPA. As an AHEPA member, he has been a supreme governor, a supreme secretary, chairman of the supreme board of trustees, supreme vice president and he's currently supreme president.

Under George's direction, the AHEPA's national headquarters in Washington were modernized, complete with a new computer.

For the past 8 years, he has been chairman of the Budget and Finance Committee at the national conventions, and has been the advisor and consultant regarding the AHEPA's investments.

George has been active in the Greek Orthodox Church ever since his family moved to Allentown, PA, in 1957. In 1982, his eminence, the archbishop, appointed him as a member of the archdiocesan council and a member of the archdiocesan finance and executive committees. He was recently bestowed with the honor of "Founder of St. Andrew" and archon of the ecumenical patriarchate.

George has been president and chairman of the board of directors of Atlas Minerals & Chemicals, Inc., of Mertztown, PA, since 1978. He has guided the company to prosperity and has provided the community with his leadership.

In sum, Mr. Speaker, George Gabriel, along with his lovely wife, Evangeline, is the kind of concerned and active man who makes the community in which he lives a better place.

ON MYTH, GRIDLOCK AND GRAMM-RUDMAN

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, I am about to tell you more than you even wanted to know about Gramm-Rudman. As they say in the old movies, "it's not a pretty story."

But before we get into "what" Gramm-Rudman does, let's examine the "why"of it.

HOW DID WE GET HERE, ANYWAY?

In 1980, as this administration took office, the annual deficit had averaged around $20 billion per year for the last decade, and the national debt had climbed—over the nearly 200-year history of the country—to about $1 trillion.

In 1986, we are running annual deficits over five times as large as the previous decade—they quiver around $200 billion per year—and we have doubled the national debt to $2 trillion. That's pretty good work for just 5 short years, if you are trying to destroy the American Government's ability to provide legitimate and often essential services to its people. I would suggest, furthermore, that among those services endangered in this wash of red ink is the country's ability to defend itself and play its role in international affairs as the leader of the free world.

Here's how things got so out of hand. Starting in 1981, the administration simultaneously initiated two contradictory policies: First, massively increased spending on defense; and second, a tax cut that reduced Government income. Even after we cut spending in nondefense areas we were still bringing in less and spending more than before. It doesn't take a mathematician to predict the result.

Of course, it wasn't supposed to work that way. The Kemp-Roth type tax cut was supposed to so stimulate the economy that we would "cut tax rates without reducing revenues." It was a happy fairy tale, that did not work. The tax cut reduced revenues by $700 billion over 5 years. That's over two-thirds of the entire deficit for that period right there.

It is also instructive to remember that the defense increases came on top of the largest peacetime boost in defense spending in the history of the country. That was during the last year of the Carter administration.

So revenues go down. Spending goes up. The deficit is multiplied. The national debt doubles in 5 years. And the American people are beginning to remember Oliver Hardy's line, "It's a fine mess you've gotten us into this time."

A LITTLE ABOUT MYTHOLOGY

How do we get out of this mess?

One of the big problems in trying to develop a solution to the deficit is that layers of mythology cover the facts. Let me cite some examples.

Myth: If we could just get the cheats off welfare, we could balance the budget.

Fact: Welfare, as it is generally thought of, constitutes less than 7 percent of the total budget. That's not the cheats. That's the entire program. The deficit, by comparison, is about 21 percent.

Myth: Cut foreign aid and we could balance the budget.

Fact: Nonmilitary foreign aid is about ½ percent of the budget and is, frankly, spent on what we consider to be in our own best interest. Except for occasional instances of natural disaster, the days of our spreading money around the world for largely humanitarian reasons is, for good or ill, gone and has been for 30 years.

Myth: Eliminate waste, fraud, and abuse. You'll balance the budget.

Fact: There is no excuse for wasting tax dollars. Fraud should be prosecuted and abuses ended when they are found as, in fact, they are. We've tightened military procurement, and more is being done. We've tightened up food stamps and similar programs. But, this alone will not balance the budget either.

Myth: Just make all those countries that owe us money pay it back and we could balance the budget.

Fact: Most debts owed us are being paid off. But the total owed us by all nations on all debts is $72.5 billion, about one-third of our annual deficit. We should continue to insist on repayment, as we do, but this provides no easy deficit solution either.

The problem with these myths is that they give us the impression that there is really an easy way to address this deficit problem. As long as we believe that, it will be very hard to develop a realistic and, therefore, effective solution.

There is, incidentally, one other prevalent myth abroad in the land that is a crucial impediment to public understanding of what's going on. It's the "fiddling while Rome burns" myth. Its premise is that people in Washington, DC, don't really understand the gravity of the deficit problem and that we are all just engaged in business as usual. Well, that's not true either. But there is reason that we may look that way.

THE GRIDLOCK

What we have in official Washington—in the administration and in the Congress—is a gridlock about priorities. Everyone understands we have to reduce the deficit. Everyone knows that will involve reduced spending. But everyone also has some programs that they feel must be exempt from cutting. By the time each of us removes our priority programs from consideration there isn't enough left to deal effectively with the deficit.

For example, the President is demanding we raise defense spending to cover inflation and then add an 8-percent increase on top of that for fiscal 1987. Defense is the largest single budget category, so that's a whopping increase in overall spending. But he's not doing that for frivolous or political reasons. In fact, the polls show it's a pretty unpopular idea. And, in my judgment, since we've doubled defense spending in 5 years, if there isn't enough money now the President has a management problem not an appropriations problem. He genuinely believes the build up is essential and he wants the defense budget "off the negotiating table."

Others, just as genuinely, believe that other programs are essential. If we fail to make investments now in research and development, where will we be in 20 or 30 years when that kind of investment—which is being made now by our trading partners—finally pays off? We could lose our world leadership in technology.

What happens if we fail to make the investment in education for our children? You cannot retrofit an entire generation of Americans when it becomes clear in a couple of decades that we haven't provided our children with the knowledge they need to compete in a more sophisticated workplace with workers in other nations like Japan and West Germany.

That is precisely the source of the gridlock. What is at issue are fundamental disagreements on national priorities. These are crucial considerations and ones that cannot be dismissed. Yet, we must find a way to break that gridlock.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE SACRED COW

While it is, obviously, easier said than done, each of us has to put our favorite programs back on the negotiating table if we are to break the gridlock. Defense must be there, along with all the rest.

Everything should be the subject of negotiation, because if we don't deal effectively with the deficit, everything—every program—is jeopardized in the long run, anyway.

If we all try to protect our sacred cow, we will all run out of hay. Then, when all cows die, everyone loses. That just doesn't make good sense.

ENTER, GRAMM-RUDMAN, LAUGHING

At the start, it was a little funny. The House had passed a bill to raise the debt ceiling on August 1. In October, the Senate still hadn't acted on it. The debt ceiling raiser is a demagog's dream. It is easy to say that we can curtail spending by not raising the debt ceiling. The fact is that the money has already been spent, and all this action does is let the Government pay its bills. Voting against raising the debt ceiling is like thinking you're controlling your overcharging by refusing to pay your credit card bills.

Anyway, a lot of those who'd had field days in the past when debt ceiling bills came up under other Presidents now found themselves in the embarrassing position of having to vote for one that raised it above the staggering figure of $2 trillion. Moreover, half of that debt had been created on their watch, and they were rather embarrassed. So some of them decided to swath this unwelcome measure in an attractive blanket—one labeled deficit reduction.

At first it was even more amusing because its sponsors suggested that the defense budget—the largest single budget item—be exempted from the provisions. That was ludicrous.

It stopped being funny, however, when it became clear that this bill was going to pass, ill-conceived as it was. With that in mind, the House got to work to try to improve the thing. We were successful in a number of respects.

GRAMM-RUDMAN SOBERS UP

First, we succeeded in putting the defense budget back into the Gramm-Rudman procedure, where it should have been.

Second, a few other programs, all with smaller budgets, were exempted. These included things like Social Security, railroad retirement and veterans pensions, Medicaid and aid to families with dependent children.

Third, we put in a provision for immediate court review of the constitutionality of the whole thing.

We made a number of other improvements and ended up with a procedure by which to approach deficit reduction. It is a flawed procedure. It is clumsy. But it has, in my view, one major virtue. More about that in a minute.

HERE'S HOW GRAMM-RUDMAN IS SUPPOSED TO WORK

Gramm-Rudman sets a specific dollar amount to which the deficit must be reduced each year. Those annual goals are to balance the budget in 5 years—by 1991.

The President submits his budget, showing how he would reach the annual goal.

Congress goes through the normal budgeting process to reach the same goal, using its set of priorities.

If the goal is reached, that's it. Gramm-Rudman stops there.

However, if Congress and the President can't agree, or if economic projections—which are always a part of any budget—prove wrong and the deficit reduction goal is missed, Gramm-Rudman provides a "sequestering" process. That simply means that all programs which are not exempt take an "across the board" cut of whatever percentage is necessary to reach the goal.

At this point no distinction is made between one program and another, between what may be necessary and what is nice. Programs that have already been hit hard, will take another hit along with those who may have been treated more generously.

But this very mindlessness may make the President and Congress want to meet the deficit reduction goals themselves rather than triggering sequestration. That's the theory. And if it works, it may be the tool that can break the gridlock in which we find ourselves. There is another possible benefit to come out of this flawed process.

THE "BORROW AND SPEND" CYCLE

Recent polls show that about two-thirds of the American people believe that some form of a tax increase will have to be part of the effort to balance the budget. The President, almost alone in his own party as well as in the Congress as a whole, believes we can balance the budget through spending cuts alone while still increasing the defense budget. That is exactly the approach that got us into the "borrow and spend" cycle which ran up these deficits.

But, the dreaded sequestration process of Gramm-Rudman may be the one thing that can force the administration to understand that two of its key policies are inherently contradictory. At sequestration the President will have to choose between massive increases in defense spending or his "no tax increase" policy. That is the key to the gridlock.

However, one needs a bit more information on where the Federal tax dollar is spent to know why spending cuts alone won't do the job.

Four items—just four—account for over 71 percent of the entire Federal budget. I'm using fiscal 1985 figures, but the proportions are essentially the same for current years.

	Percent
1. Defense	27
2. Social Security	20
3. Interest on the national debt	14
4. Health programs (essentially Medicare and Medicaid)	10.5
Total	71.5

That leaves only 28.5 percent of the budget from which the administration says all the spending cuts must come. Considering that the budget is out of balance by 21 percent, simple arithmetic tells you what the administration is really saying is to abolish most all the rest of the Government. Let's look at those other expenditures.

Program	Percent of budget	Spending trend since 1981
Public assistance	6.6	Flat.[1]
Education, manpower, and disability	3.0	Down
Aid to veterans	2.8	Do.
Transportation and business credits	3.0	Do.
Civil service retirement	2.5	Do.
Unemployment compensation	2.5	Do.[1]
International affairs	1.6	Do.
Energy	.4	Do.[2]
All other outlays	6.1	Flat.

[1] These fluctuated during the period due to recession.
[2] This has been cut 75 percent with conservation and renewable energy research at a standstill. Only nuclear research continues.

What this means is that virtually every Government service or program you have ever heard about would have to be abolished if we are to balance the budget with spending cuts alone. Those programs would include all research and development—including medical research—education, the FBI, Customs and Immigration Services, Border Patrol and the Coast Guard, housing, the Supreme Court, the Congress—a lot of people like that idea—the Presidency itself, the Soil Conservation Program, all agricultural programs, the Parks and Forest Services, meat inspection, all veterans programs and on and on.

Those myths didn't tell us that. When most Americans thought about cutting spending, they meant wasteful programs and abuses of otherwise valuable programs. But we had a disproportionate idea of the assumed budget impact and, as a result, budget balancing always seemed as if it should be a relatively easy task. It's turning out to be tougher than expected.

The disagreement with the President is not philosophical. It is arithmetic.

I voted for Gramm-Rudman for one simple reason. If it will force us to deal with both spending and revenues as the twin solutions to the deficit, it will have accomplished something very useful.

TAX INCREASE? WHAT DO YOU HAVE IN MIND?

The first thing one thinks of when they hear of a tax increase is a rise in the income tax. But there are other ways.

For example, right now would be a good time to consider an oil import tax. With world oil prices dropping, we could put in place a tax that would essentially keep prices at the pump level and raise an estimated $11 to $16 billion. As consumers, we would not get the benefit of lower prices, but neither would our costs go up. This could be one of the few relatively painless actions we can take to help reduce the deficit.

Furthermore, the President's tax reform bill is going through Congress now. By closing loopholes, we will be able to reduce tax rates. If we reduce them less than we would for a "revenue neutral" bill, we could raise new revenue—basically from loophole closing.

Another approach: repeal part or all of the 1981 tax cut. That tax reduction went primarily to upper income people. The whole theory of Kemp-Roth was to free up spending money for the wealthy in the belief that it would then be invested and propel the economy to new heights. Instead, we had the worst recession since 1928, and the wealthy put their money into tax shelters rather than productive enterprises. But that's another story.

So we could reduce that tax cut and restore needed revenues. That would avoid a tax increase for most middle- and low-income Americans who never benefited from the 1981 tax cut. And those whose taxes would go up would have benefited from 5 years of significantly lower taxes anyway.

JEOPARDY IS MORE THAN A GAME SHOW

The crisis we face can be underrated. No matter how far back you can remember, we've always heard complaints about deficit spending. All the rhetoric about leaving this burden to our children and grandchildren is true, but it's become a cliche. It's as though we cried "wolf" so often that it doesn't mean much anymore. And, in fact, things have been pretty good for Americans for a long time, through years of deficit and years of surplus. Yes, there have been surpluses. We just never hear about them. But these deficits we're facing today are different. This time our situation is critical.

What is so different?

First, the deficit is bigger than anything we've ever heard of before. It's a larger portion of the budget. It's a greater percentage of the gross national product. It can consume a greater share of the Nation's credit supply. By every measure these deficits are more critical because they are immensely larger.

Second, it's important to know that currently about 15 cents of every tax dollar goes to pay interest on the national debt. If nothing is done some have predicted that number could increase sharply by the end of the decade. It is possible that the deficit can grow so large it will devour our capacity to do much of anything with our Federal revenues except service the debt.

Programs that have meant so much to Americans over the years in urban areas and on the farm, for education and health, for law enforcement and transportation, for commerce and in space, and, yes, for defense—all those programs are jeopardized by this sponge-like deficit with its potential for soaking up all the revenues we use to pay for them.

But it doesn't stop there.

WHAT HAPPENS IF THE ECONOMY HICCUPS?

One of the things that a national government has to do that no other budget, private or public, really has to be concerned with is administering the economy. When a recession or depression threatens, the national government has to step in. That usually means deficit spending for a time to "prime the pump" of the economy and get it moving again. And a tax increase in the face of an economic downturn is disastrous, because it will drive the economy deeper and deeper into depression.

There are several ominous potentials that could trigger problems for the U.S. economy. One is possible default by foreign debtor nations. These are not debts owed to the U.S. Government but to major U.S. banks. Some of our largest banks are overexposed to some very large and very shaky loans to developing countries. Many economists believe that some defaults could so damage these banks that it could shake the entire economy of the country.

Other harm to the economy associated with the deficit has been masked by an unusual occurrence. The normal problems caused by giant deficits have not been obvious to us recently because the U.S. dollar has been so strong in foreign countries. In other words, foreigners have been buying our bonds as investments so that we have not had to finance these debts from our own domestic economy. That's protected us from the usual leaps in interest rates that accompany a large deficit.

But the strong dollar also means that no one wants to buy our goods. Our trade deficit is running at $145 billion a year, and that drain poses other problems all its own. So we should do everything we can to bring the dollar down, right?

It's not that easy. If the dollar drops, we will have to service our deficit ourselves, sell those bonds here at home. That means the Federal Government will be into the Nation's supply of credit for something like over half of all that is there. Unless someone repealed the law of supply and demand while we weren't watching, that should inflate interest and start us off on another economic ski jump.

And then—and this is the point—then we cannot reduce spending or increase taxes without making our economic situation worse, driving the recession deeper.

NO ONE EVER FOUGHT A WAR ON A BALANCED BUDGET

Just as a national government has to run the economy, so does it deal exclusively with national defense. And an economic crisis and a military crisis can create much the same budget problem. Usually wars are neither cheap nor optional. They can affect the economy so as to drive a deficit deeper too.

No one wants either economic trouble or war. But we don't have total control over either eventuality. Should either happen now, we would be incredibly vulnerable because, while we would do what we had to do, it would leave us with what debt we incurred in the crisis piled on top of the debt we've managed to build during the last 5 years when we were at peace.

The question is simply: How much can you add to a $200 million annual deficit and expect to recover?

Common sense tells us that:

First, we must deal with the deficits.

Second, it can't be done without a two-pronged effort of both spending restraint and revenue increases.

Third, speed is important so we can reduce spending and raise new revenues to deal with the deficit now, before economic conditions change and make either course of action questionable.

Fourth, the sooner we get about it, the shorter period we're in jeopardy and the sooner we can again have the flexibility to deal with crises, economic or military.

BUILDING BACK

We have to start building back. Pulling that deficit down is the first order of business, but not the last. Some of the budget cuts we've made—and others that are yet to come—have damaged programs that are very valuable to all of us.

Some examples:

The Border Patrol can't afford to board illegal aliens in county jails. Neither can it afford to transport them to the border for deportation.

The Forest Service is closing camp grounds right and left. It is abandoning trails. It hasn't the money to maintain either. Timber sales may be slowed because of limited road building.

User fees are being proposed for practically anything from meat inspection to camp grounds to going through customs.

Financial aid to veterans trying to go to college is cut.

The Small Business Administration is slated for extinction.

Revenue sharing for local governments is gone, severely limiting many local programs.

Education funding is chopped.

Farm credit is the worst since the Great Depression.

And on it goes. The fact is those "myths" nailed us again. We've been mesmerized and infuriated by the "Welfare Queen." That image—hugely exaggerated—has made us so concerned that under serving people might get something they shouldn't have, that many have applauded the erosion of the infrastructure of Government—the very programs that have built the broadest, proudest, most free, most affluent middle class the world has ever seen.

Most of these programs really helped us all.

For example, families tend to move around more. Low income housing for senior citizens has been a Godsend, not just for the elderly, but for their families who often live too far away to provide the kind of direct, personal support they might have had a generation ago.

Many of us have college educations because of one form or another of student aid.

Veterans, having served their country, got an education or bought a house, or both, with the proper and welcome help of Government.

Farmers, some of the most ruggedly independent people in our society, have used Government to keep the family farm alive and to help keep America's consumers out of the clutches of corporate farms with their greater marketplace clout.

The vast majority of Government programs have always helped to build and sustain the middle class. We take them for granted. But now they are eroding. Some are gone. We will have to build them again, both to secure ourselves and to help others get a fair shot at the American dream.

The one thing that should be clear now is that it was not these programs that created our present budget crisis, because this deficit grows while those very programs on which deficits have always been blamed are being slashed and eliminated.

But we can't restore these efforts if we don't restore our ability to finance them. That's what's at stake in this fight to control the deficit: Nothing less than our ability to build into the next century an America as great and strong, as compassionate and prosperous as the one our parents built for us. This generation will not preside over the dissolution of the good that was passed on to us. We will build back a great legacy. We will pass it along. But our ability to do that will be determined by what we do in the next few months to deal with the damnable deficit.

We must abandon the myths that confound us if we are to secure the dream of opportunity and justice for everyone. We need to revive our ability to work together, directly with each other and through Government, to preserve life and liberty and to pursue happiness with all the vigor the diverse people of this great Nation possess.

THE CONSTITUENTS' TOLL FREE FRIEND

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, for almost as many years as I have been honored to serve in the Congress, a very special person has served the people of South Dakota with tremendous dedication.

After thousands of phone calls on the toll-free line from people in our State seeking help on everything from matters of life and death to another White House ticket, Lee has served with empathy and enthusiasm. She epitomizes the very best in a deep personal commitment to public service.

Recently, an article appeared in the Washington Post providing a glimpse into her work and the impact which she has on the lives of those South Dakotans with whom she works. It confirms what we've known for a long time. We're lucky to have her.

THE CONSTITUENTS' TOLL-FREE FRIEND

(By Donnie Radcliffe)

It started out as a campaign promise by Rep. Thomas A. Daschle in 1978: a toll-free help line. But for scores of his constituents, the South Dakota Democrat's 1-800 number has turned into a life—and death—line.

Last week it brought a death notice, the last wish of a Korean War veteran, Larry Rodman, 48, in and out of veterans hospitals most of the time since the war. For him, "next of kin" was the voice at the other end of the telephone: Lee Edel, who has been manning Daschle's 1-800 line from the beginning.

Edel has become the voice of concern here for others in distress, whether they are veterans, parents looking for lost children, needy families, Medicare patients, Social Security recipients or South Dakota's farmers feeling the squeeze of the Reagan administration's farm policies.

Lately, most of the calls for help have come from the farmers, some of them suggesting a solution all too final. "We used to get a suicide call every six months; now it's about once a week," says Edel.

Sometimes the callers are distraught farm wives secretly seeking help for husbands who face foreclosure and bankruptcy. Sometimes they are the farmers themselves, telling their personal versions of the now-familiar Farm Belt horror stories about sheriff's sales and auctioneers.

Edel says she does not panic at talk of suicide. "Having had two parents who went that route, I am not easily shocked," she says. Instead, she listens, using a calm, sympathetic, if reasoned, approach in telling the caller "what it's like for those they will leave behind."

Larry Rodman's first call in 1982 also had that desperation in it. He telephoned from a South Dakota veterans hospital seeking help for his tangled affairs as a war veteran. In the years that followed (and in accordance with instructions from Daschle, a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, to take calls from veterans wherever they are), Edel and Rodman continued to talk, wherever he went—the Midwest, New England or the South. If she took a special interest, she says now, it was because she discovered early that his home town, too, was Canton, Ohio.

Then last week a woman called from the veterans hospital at Johnson City, Tenn., to tell Edel that Rodman had died of heart complications. Following Rodman's instructions of whom to notify in case of death—"Lee-1-800-424-9094"—the astonished hospital worker told Edel, "I didn't think you existed."

When Edel hung up, she made her own phone call. Yes, the florist said, he would see to it that a single red rose was placed on Larry Rodman's grave.

A SCAR FROM THE CYPRIOT WAR: THE MISSING

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to discuss the continuing problem of Americans missing abroad. As chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, I am deeply concerned over reports that some Americans may still be in Vietnam as a result of the conflict in Indochina and that U.S. citizens remain hostages in Lebanon.

It is indeed sad that there are other countries where American citizens are missing. A December 27 New York Times article reports that eight Americans are missing in Cyprus as a result of the Turkish invasion in 1974. Clearly, we must be resolute in our efforts to press Turkish and Turkish-Cypriot authorities to be more forthcoming on this matter, just as we must enhance our efforts to obtain information about Americans missing in the Middle East, Southeast Asia, and elsewhere. Moreover, where Americans are being deliberately held as hostages or in violation of internationally recognized standards of justice, we must actively work for and demand their release.

I am submitting the New York Times article on the Cyprus situation for the RECORD. I hope that this report will inspire more efforts to resolve the problem of Americans missing in this country.

[From the New York Times, Dec. 27, 1985]

A SCAR FROM THE CYPRIOT WAR: THE MISSING

(By Henry Kamm)

NICOSIA, CYPRUS.—More than a decade after the Turkish invasion of this Mediterranean island, some Cypriot families still suffer from the grief of uncertainty, trying to discover what happened to relatives whose fate remains unknown and pressing for an answer that is likely to be painful.

The total of the missing on the Greek side is 1,618. They are distinct from the men, women and children lost without trace in the two surges of fighting in July and August 1974 that left the northern part of the island occupied by Turkey. They are people who, the Greek Cypriots say, probably fell into the hands of the invading army.

The Turkish Cypriots, too, have reported the names of missing people—600 from the 1974 war and 200 from fighting on the island in 1963. But the initiative that has kept the issue alive has come from the Greek Cypriots.

The victorious Turks want to put the past behind them, but the Greek Cypriots, seeking to recover what they lost, pursue the issue, constantly pressed by committees of the afflicted families.

EIGHT AMERICANS AMONG THE MISSING

The missing also includes Americans. The names of eight Americans missing since the Turkish invasion of 1974 are known. One was 17 then, an American-born youth spending the summer with relatives. The others were naturalized Americans of Cypriot origin, living out their retirement on native soil. Their ages ranged from 65 to 76.

Some of the missing Greek Cypriots were registered by the International Committee of the Red Cross as prisoners of war or civilian detainees. Others were reported by Turkey as prisoners but never set free. Still others were identified in Turkish press photographs of prisoners, spoke over the Turkish Cypriot radio or were seen by prisoners later released.

According to George Michaelides, Greek Cypriot representative on the Committee on Missing Persons, no evidence that might lead to the discovery of a listed person has turned up. The only clues that the United Nations-sponsored committee has found point to a likelihood that a missing person is dead.

In private conversations, Cypriot officials on both sides, as well as international officials, say they do not think any of the missing are still alive. Summary killings were a mark of a conflict in which pent-up ethnic antagonisms found outlets when tension broke out into warfare.

A COUP, THEN THE INVASION

Turkish Cypriot officials assert that many of the missing were killed by the Greek Cypriot extremists who staged the coup against their own Government that brought on the Turkish invasion. On the Greek side, officials insist that all the 1,618 are known to have been captured by Turkish forces.

So divisive is the issue that it took more than three years, until 1977, for the United Nations to call for the creation of an investigative body. Only in 1981 did Greek and Turkish Cypriots agree on its terms of reference and name its three members, including a Swiss official chosen by the International Committee of the Red Cross, a Swiss organization. It took three more years to agree on procedures before work began last year.

Mr. Michaelides said the committee had met 24 times to present some of the cases. Work is slowed by the fact that at Turkish Cypriot insistence no investigators are allowed to work on the opposing side. Investigation is carried out by the neutral member, accompanied by a representative of the accused side.

No individual case has been completed, Mr. Michaelides said. Of the missing Americans, only the case of Andrew K. Kasapis, born in Detroit in 1957 and raised in the suburb of Highland Park, has been presented for investigation so far.

His family was told in October 1974 by a released prisoner that Mr. Kasapis was in a Turkish prison. The next month his name appeared on a list of students to be released that the Turkish side submitted to the United Nations.

Mr. Kasapis was one of six on the list who were never turned over. The Turkish Cypriots have given no explanation.

SOIL CONSERVATION

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, March 12, 1986, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

SOIL CONSERVATION

One of the few farm programs to be significantly overhauled during the rewrite of the omnibus farm law last year was soil conservation. The new changes have been called the most significant soil conservation legislation in the past 50 years.

The impetus for change was the widespread recognition that our soil erosion problem is not improving. America is losing some 5 billion tons of topsoil every year through water and wind erosion. the problem stems from several factors, including expanded use of soil-depleting crops, less crop rotation, more absentee landlords, and the farming of marginal land. Expanded use of conservation tillage, in which new crops are planted over the previous year's residue, has helped, but the problem remains serious. The "permissible" level of erosion is 5 tons per acre each year (a layer of soil the thickness of a dime), yet nationwide the annual topsoil loss on cultivated cropland exceeds 8 tons per acre. Nearly half of all US cropland, and 40% of Indiana's, exceeds the acceptable erosion rates.

High erosion rates can reduce the land's productivity, but it also causes other problems. In particular, there is growing concern about the off-site costs, such as the costs of removing deposits in channels and reservoirs, and treating water to remove sediments and agricultural chemicals. Estimates put the off-site costs of erosion at $3-13 billion annually.

In response to these problems, the new farm law makes several major changes in conservation policy. Under the "sodbuster" program, farmers who plant crops on highly erodible land will lose price supports and other federal farm benefits on all of their crops. This will primarily affect farmers in the West, and similar "swampbuster" provisions are aimed mainly at the conversion of wetlands to croplands in the Southeast and the upper Midwest. Another new program, the conservation reserve, pays farmers to return highly erodible cropland to less intensive uses (such as planting it with grass or trees) for at least 10 years. To minimize the local impact, no more than 25% of the land in any county can be enrolled. Proponents claim that if 40 million of our 53 million "highly erodible" acres are put into the reserve, our overall soil erosion would be cut by a third. These new programs target our efforts, because a small portion of the cropland is responsible for most of the excess erosion.

These changes were strongly supported by a surprisingly diverse coalition, including not only conservationists, but farm groups and the Reagan Administration, which has traditionally favored cutting soil conservation funding. Although supporters' reasons varied, several points were made in favor of the changes. First, our past conservation efforts have not worked well enough. Despite 26 Department of Agriculture conservation programs costing $1 billion a year, our erosion problem is not being solved. Most farmers with serious erosion problems are not enrolled in the programs, and financial hardship could force others to abandon conservation efforts. The new programs offer greater promise. For example, USDA estimates that the conservation reserve will reduce erosion rates by 10 times the amount achieved before. Second, recent production—oriented federal farm programs often contributed to our erosion problem, so changes were sought to bring our commodity and conservation programs more into harmony. Third, many felt that we should no longer pay federal subsidies to those who abuse the land. Finally, strong soil conservation programs offered the potential not only to protect the environment, but also to help our troubled farm sector by reducing overproduction, stabilizing crop prices, and cutting government program costs. For example, although setting up the conservation reserve would cost an estimated $5 billion over the first 5 years, USDA estimates that idling this land would save almost $8 billion in subsidies to purchase and store surplus crops. Bolstered by these arguments, the new conservation programs sailed through the House and the Senate, and were approved by the President.

Yet not everyone is totally sold on the new programs. Some object to the idea of paying farmers not to abuse their own soil, and argue that the best way to discourage the farming of fragile land is to reduce federal farm production subsidies. Others feel that the claims of reduced productivity from eroded soil are exaggerated, because any such reductions might be more than offset by the biotechnology revolution. Another concern is that the programs may not work as well as advertised. The projected USDA savings from land idled through the conservation reserve could be lower than estimated if farmers boost production on their remaining land, or if a significant number of acres put into the reserve were not growing commodity program crops anyway. Moreover, there are memories of the exaggerated estimates of savings from the Administration's PIK program, and some question whether all the new conservation programs will be fully implemented by the Administration, fully funded by Congress during a time of major fiscal constraint, or continued if our farm export demand picks up. Finally, critics point out that the major focus of the new conservation changes is to protect highly erodible land—land that probably should not have been put into production in the first place—while giving much less attention to reducing erosion rates on our prime farmland.

Despite such objections, my own view is that the programs signal an important and positive new direction in federal soil conservation policy. Certainly we would no longer subsidize farmers who are abusing the land; the sodbuster changes were long overdue. Whether we should also subsidize farmers for not abusing their own land, through the conservation reserve, is a more difficult question. My sense is that the reserve may not work out as well as some of its strongest proponents think it will. Yet a strong federal role in soil conservation is justified. America's fragile topsoil is one of our most precious natural resources. New conservation programs may be difficult to fund at a time when many valuable programs are being cut, but if we do not improve our conservation efforts, we may soon discover that our farmland, a primary source of our nation's strength, has been damaged beyond repair.

H.R. 700, THE CIVIL RIGHTS RESTORATION ACT

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, "More than 200 discrimination cases have been dismissed or postponed by Federal agencies since the Grove City ruling," points out the below-set-forth Washington Post editorial of March 12, 1986.

This is discrimination on a massive national scale, and it emphasizes how important the prompt enactment of H.R. 700, the Civil Rights Restoration Act is.

The editorial also points out that to enact the bill cooperation between longtime allies and civil rights supporters is essential.

Mr. Speaker, we hope that this hope can become a reality with all the friends of civil rights working together to pass this key bill.

CIVIL RIGHTS STALEMATE

Thousands of women who came to this city on Sunday to march for abortion rights stayed over and spent Monday lobbying on the Hill. Their objective is to get Congress moving on the Grove City bill, which was designed to overturn a 1984 Supreme Court decision involving civil rights laws and federally funded institutions. The measure has been tied up in the House for almost a year because of somewhat peripheral but controversial questions involving religion and abortion.

The Supreme Court, in the case involving Grove City College, had limited the government's ability to enforce civil rights laws applicable to federal aid recipients. These laws, the court held, apply only to the particular program receiving federal funds—a physics lab, for example, or a special course for the disabled—rather than the entire institution of which that program is a part. There was an immediate response to the ruling in Congress, and a bill passed the House 375 to 34 but died in the Senate. Some initial objections to the scope of the bill were ironed out after Congress adjourned, and in 1985 a new bill was introduced, with dozens of cosponsors in the Senate and more than 200 in the House. To everyone's surprise, new opposition surfaced in the House, and the bill has been stalled there since committee action was completed last May. Abortion is the stumbling block.

Catholic bishops, who traditionally have been part of the broad civil rights lobbying coalition, have supported two amendments to the bill. The first would repeal regulations that prohibit educational institutions receiving federal funds from discriminating with regard to abortion services or benefits; the second would exempt from the regulations these institutions affiliated with religious organizations—only those controlled by these organizations now qualify for exemption—in cases where compliance would conflict with religious tenets. These are important questions, and they are worthy of congressional consideration. But putting the amendments on a broader, far less controversial bill, as a House committee has done, has created a stalemate.

More than 200 discrimination cases have been dismissed or postponed by federal agencies since the Grove City ruling. If the important work of clarifying the law and restoring its original intent is to go forward, the impasse on abortion must be broken. The best solution would be to reach an agreement to consider these peripheral questions in a separate bill. At the very least, a high level conference between the concerned church leaders and the sponsors of the restoration act should be scheduled to work out a compromise. Time is short, and powerful opponents of the civil rights laws at issue lie in wait in the Senate. A disagreement between longtime allies and civil rights supporters should not prevent action in the House, where the measure has a commanding majority.

WILLIAM RASPBERRY FINDS SUCCESS AT KENILWORTH-PARKSIDE HOUSING PROJECT

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, Washington, DC's, Kenilworth-Parkside Housing Project, under the dynamic leadership of Kimi Gray, has become a model of public-private partnership for the Nation. Through their Resident Management Corp., the tenants of Kenilworth-Parkside have made their community an example of what can be accomplished when Government allows individuals to have greater control of their destiny. My friends Bob Woodson of the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise and Congressman WALTER FAUNTROY of the District of Columbia have been working together on legislation to facilitate the formation of resident management systems like Kenilworth-Parkside's, and we will soon be joining together to reintroduce this legislation, together with my bill to allow public housing residents to purchase their units from the Government at discounts. I commend this article to the attention of my colleagues, and I hope they will join with us in pursuing this effective proposal.

STUDYING SUCCESS

(By William Raspberry)

(The only reason to spend your time studying failure is if you want to produce more failure. You cannot learn to produce success by studying failure. Every school, every neighborhood, no matter how dismal its circumstances, has successes. It's a mystery to me why we spend so much time crying over our failures and so little time trying to learn from our successes.—Robert L. Woodson, president of the Center for Neighborhood Enterprise.)

Neither Bob Woodson nor D.C. Del. Walter E. Fauntroy knew what to expect a couple of months ago when they agreed to a face-to-face meeting arranged by a mutual friend.

Fauntroy, whose background is the civil rights movement is as solidly liberal as any member of Congress. Woodson, whose very name can evoke sneers from some members of the civil rights community, is head of a bipartisan group of black conservatives known as the Council for a Black Economic Agenda.

What could these two talk about without going for each other's throats?

Well, it turns out that, has one result of that meeting, Fauntroy has introduced legislation to encourage one of Woodson's pet ideas: resident management of public housing.

Fauntroy looked at what a woman named Kimi Gray has done at the Kenilworth-Parkside public housing project in Northeast Washington, and he was sufficiently impressed by what he saw to want to make it possible for others like her to come to the surface.

What Gray and her Resident Management Corp. have done is to halt the deterioration of a project that once went three years without heat and hot water; provided employment for scores of residents; launched businesses run by and for their tenants, and, miraculously, turned the deficit-ridden complex into a black-ink enterprise, more than doubling rent collections.

Gray and her colleagues had to fight for the right to manage their 464-unit property. Fauntroy's legislation, while it would not make resident management automatic, would establish this idea of a resident management corporation as a policy goal.

It would also make it possible to do what Gray was able to do only after she won a fight against the District Building: retain the profits from her improved rent collections and newly efficient management to provide jobs, services and, eventually, more homes for low-income families.

It is just the sort of idea that has appeal for both liberals and conservatives concerned about helping the poor. The emphasis of the liberal is on the government's responsibility in helping to remedy problems that it helped to create, although the liberal recognizes that people have a responsibility for improving their own circumstances. The conservative lays stress on having the government get out of the way so that people can run their own lives, although he acknowledges that the government's help is sometimes vital.

That is why these two, away from the glare of the television cameras, were able to find areas of agreement. There are doubtless others, if liberals and conservatives will look for them instead of looking for ways to make one another look ridiculous.

Fauntroy understands that there are very few Kimi Grays, in public housing or out, and that his legislation won't create them. It is unlikely, for instance, that many of the RMC's created as a result of his bill would be able to match—though some might—Gray's record of sending 580 of her residents to post-secondary education. (Before she took over, an average of two residents per year went to college.)

But Fauntroy is proposing opportunities, not miracles. He wants to create the possibility that others can learn from Kenilworth-Parkside and similar successes around the country.

VETERANS READJUSTMENT APPOINTMENT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today which would extend and improve the veterans readjustment appointment authority, a hiring program which has helped launch over 250,000 veterans of the Vietnam era in civilian careers with the Federal Government. This authority, which under current law expires on September 30, 1986, allows certain Vietnam-era veterans to be appointed noncompetitively to Federal civilian jobs which lead to competitive status and career or career-conditional tenure upon satisfactory completion of 2 years of service and education or training. The concept of the VRA was first instituted by Executive Order 11397, issued by President Lyndon Johnson on February 7, 1968. The program was further developed by Executive Order 11521 issued by President Nixon in April 1970 and codified by Public Law 93-508 which was enacted December 3, 1974. The legislation I am today introducing would improve the VRA program and extend until December 31, 1991, the authority set forth in section 2014(b) of title 38, United States Code, for veterans readjustment appointments—VRA's. I am very pleased the chairman of the full committee, G. V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY, the ranking minority member, JOHN PAUL HAMMERSCHMIDT, as well as all members of the Subcommittee on Education, Training and Employment are joining me as original cosponsors.

The success and value of the VRA is easily demonstrated by the 250,000 Vietnam-era veterans who have entered the civil service under the VRA program. Additionally, OPM's semiannual report to Congress for the second half of fiscal year 1983 indicates that of the 17,341 VRA employees onboard as of December 31, 1978, and tracked through December 31, 1981, an impressive 79.4 percent were converted to career or career-conditional status. This extremely high percentage of conversions clearly shows that veterans hired by the Federal Government using the VRA authority are competent, desirable employees and that veterans want to continue their Government service as Federal civilian employees. Vietnam veterans served their country with distinction during a difficult era. These veterans have proven their commitment to their country and exhibited their ability to work and function in a disciplined, competent manner, often under extremely stressful circumstances. We want and need these former service members in the civil service, and should encourage these veterans to again serve their country.

Last year, the House passed H.R. 1408, Veterans' Employment Amendments of 1985. Among the provisions contained in H.R. 1408 were several improvements to the VRA program, but unfortunately, the Senate has never acted on this bill. I am including those provisions in the bill I am introducing today. These improvements are important to the continuing success of the VRA program, and I think we in the House want to again say to the Senate that we support employment opportunities in the Federal Government for Vietnam veterans.

Many of these veterans lacked the skills and advanced education needed to compete in a tight labor market when this program was initially established as a means to help in the readjustment of veterans returning from Southeast Asia. Since that time, however, VA statistics indicate that 80 percent of the veterans of the Vietnam era have utilized at least part of their GI bill educational assistance benefits. In recognition of this, the bill I am introducing today, as did H.R. 1408, would eliminate the current educational restriction which prohibits a nondisabled Vietnam-era veteran from qualifying as a VRA appointee if he or she has over 14 years of education. It is time to update the VRA program and cease denying veterans employment because they have increased their education. The education restriction now defeats the main purpose of the VRA program which is to provide long-term employment opportunities to Vietnam-era veterans.

Under current law, service-disabled veterans enjoy a certain advantage under the VRA program because they are not subject to the 14-year education restriction. To continue this advantage, this legislation provides that preference for a VRA appointment would be given to a service-connected disabled Vietnam veteran over other Vietnam-era veterans who have more than 14 years of education.

The bill I am introducing today would additionally raise the highest entry grade for VRA hires from GS–9 to GS–11. This, too, is identical to a provision in H.R. 1408, which passed the House last year. In keeping with the VRA purpose of providing long-term employment opportunities, I believe that those veterans who are qualified for a higher level job should be encouraged to come to work for the Federal Government, not be held back because of their experience and educational achievements. Additionally, agencies would have increased flexibility when making employment decisions thereby increasing agency usage of the VRA hiring authority.

In this time of budget austerity, I think it is important to point out that there are no costs associated with the VRA program. Agency usage of this hiring authority is voluntary and VRA positions are regular civil service positions that count against an agency's staffing ceiling. Thus, over a quarter of a million Vietnam-era veterans have been brought into the Federal civil service at no cost to the taxpayer.

This Nation is obligated to assist veterans who are seeking employment. It is also in the best interest of our Nation to encourage veterans to seek employment with the Federal Government. The VRA program accomplishes both of those goals. I urge you to support this legislation.

IN TRIBUTE TO MYRON COHEN

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, we recently learned with a great deal of sadness that one of our Nation's foremost comedians, Myron Cohen, died this week of a heart attack at the age of 83. A resident of Nyack, NY, in my congressional district, Myron Cohen will always be fondly remembered by not only my constituents but by the many millions of people who were privileged to hear his witty stories and gags over these many years.

Born in Poland, Myron Cohen was raised in the United States. While he did not have an accent, he discovered his talent in re-creating the Eastern European Yiddish accent of his colleagues in the New York garment district, where for several years he was a silk salesman. Able to win sales through his ability to tell jokes and stories, Myron Cohen began his amateur career during open microphone evenings at New York's Leon and Eddie's Cafe on 52d Street. Soon he decided to become a professional comedian, and success brought him to nightclubs such as the Copacabana. Ultimately, he became known to Americans all across the Nation through his many TV appearances on the Ed Sullivan Show.

Married in 1925 to Miriam, Myron Cohen was able, with her assistance, to sustain his ability to tell stories about various ethnic groups, in dialect, without sounding the least bit negative. One of his best concerns the situation when a husband and wife go to the mountains, each takes special pains to keep an eye on the other. A married couple was seated in the dining room of their mountain hotel, and while they were eating, a beautiful young lady walked by. "That's an attractive woman," commented the husband. "You mean the one with the dyed red hair and the cheap-looking platform shoes?" "Yes, she does have red hair." "With her complexion, she should never wear that purplish color," remarked the wife. "Her dress is badly cut through the middle and hangs unevenly in the back. She shouldn't wear such light stockings, and I hate green nail polish." "I still say she's attractive," said the husband. "Of course, I can't say for sure," answered the wife, "I really didn't take a good look at her!"

Mr. Speaker, Myron Cohen had a lengthy repertory of such stories, so much so that he published a number of them in his book, "Laughing Out Loud," in 1958. He did not allow a heart attack in 1976 to interrupt his many philanthropic activities, which included numerous benefit performances for the New City Jewish Center, of which he was a founding member. His connection and involvement with our region was always close and warm, and his great dedication to the community was appreciated and recognized by all.

Mrs. Cohen died in 1981, having been married to Myron for over 55 years. Without her, Myron attempted to manage as best he could, but the devastation was clear, and he never fully recovered from her loss. Myron Cohen retired from active performing in 1984, shortly before yet another heart attack hospitalized him. Then, his third heart attack a few days ago caused the death which we mourn today. Services were held in New York City earlier today, and I extend my sincere condolences to the survivors, his brothers, Philip Cohen of Fort Lee, NJ, and Milton Cohen of Jackson Heights, Queens, as well as his two nephews, Burton Cohen of River Vale, NJ, and Dr. Mitchell Cohen of Cincinnati, OH.

Those of us who knew Myron Cohen will miss him greatly. His quiet humor and gentle wit were always able to entertain, and he always had a willing audience. Yet we still have fond memories, which will stay with us forever.

MARCH 21, 1986 IS NATIONAL ENERGY EDUCATION DAY

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on March 21, schools throughout the Nation will celebrate "National Energy Education Day," which was instituted by the Congress by proclamation in 1980.

Recently, a member of my family, fifth grader, Michelle Plaxton of Schaumburg, IL, sent me a letter detailing her school's—J. Edgar Hoover Elementary School, district 54—energy saving tips and advice. Persons are encouraged to sign a pledge and adopt an energy saving tip for that day. Frankly, I think this is a great idea and I would hope my colleagues would select one of the following energy tips so that we can help better conserve our precious natural resources. The list is as follows:

1. Read rather than watch TV.
2. Use both sides of a sheet of paper.
3. Recycle newspapers.
4. Turn off that light.
5. Take a 3-minute shower—not a bath.
6. Put weatherstrip around doors.
7. Recycle aluminum cans.
8. Replace caulking around windows.
9. Turn down your thermostat to 65° when leaving the house.
10. Turn off the water when brushing your teeth.
11. Use a hand can opener instead of an electric one.
12. Change the air filter in your furnace.
13. Check your car's air tire pressure.
14. Use flourescent instead of incandescent bulbs.
15. Close your drapes and shades on cold nights.
16. Wait for a full load for both your clothes and dishwasher.
17. Reuse your lunch bag.
18. Walk, bus, or carpool to work or school.
19. Think about what you'd like before opening the refrigerator.
20. Drive the speed limit and save gasoline.
21. Clean light fixtures to use lights efficently.
22. Limit opening the oven when baking.
23. Do not leave your car idling.

THE INSURANCE CRISIS IN THE TRUCKING INDUSTRY

HON. HAL DAUB

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I addressed this body regarding the insurance crisis. At that time I offered an example of a trucker in Nebraska who has experienced a 46-percent increase in liability insurance costs in less than 3 years.

At that time, I noted that this was just the tip of the insurance crisis iceberg and the worst was yet to come. For that Nebraska trucker, the worst did come a few days later.

After finding eight insurance agencies who were still willing to discuss coverage, the Nebraska businessman found that only two would provide bids for the liability coverage. The two bids were 630 percent and 190 percent increases, respectively, in the cost of liability insurance for this business.

These kinds of premium increases are putting many of our transportation businesses out of business. Rather than see this kind of result, however, I will be working to develop appropriate tort reform and other legislation necessary to head off this significant problem.

Moving the necessary legislation in this House and the other body, however, will be a difficult process. Only by recognizing that the problem the Nebraska trucker faces is the same as that faced in other industries, can we move meaningful reforms. In fact, the insurance crisis is just as painful for American manufacturers, public education institutions, municipal governments, professionals, day care centers, the health care of industry, farmers, and small businesses of every shape and kind.

During the coming weeks, I will be working very hard to develop a coalition of Members, private industry representatives, and State and municipal government representatives who are interested in this effort. By tapping the expertise of this broad partnership, Congress can act both expeditiously and intelligently toward putting out the insurance crisis fire.

LET'S HELP THE PHILIPPINES BECOME A MODEL FOR DEMOCRATIC CAPITALISM

HON. JACK F. KEMP
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, President Corazon Aquino's main economic adviser, Jaime V. Ongpin, could help bring the Philippines into a new era of democratic capitalism with rising growth and opportunity for that troubled nation.

In a recent article in the Wall Street Journal, Mr. Ongpin has strongly supported government policies to liberate the small businessman, entrepreneur, farmer, and small capitalist. He has endorsed a free world trading system, tax form, privatization, and fair and lawful land reform. This sounds like the supply-side economic policies which have worked so successfully in the United States and Asian countries.

Mr. Ongpin's new economic direction is one of the most exciting and promising developments in the world today. The United States and world economic organizations should do all we can to foster and bolster these positive developments. In particular, I hope that we will help the Philippines become a model of free markets and democracy for the developing world. I particularly hope that Treasury Secretary James Baker and his staff will provide the Philippines with the progrowth economic advice and material support that he has promised will be the centerpiece of American economic policy in the world.

Too many times in the past we have snuffed out free market initiatives in the developing world by promoting austerity and greater government. This time we have a fresh opportunity not only to launch the Philippines into a new ERA of democratic capitalism, but to remake U.S. foreign policy into a force for growth, entrepreneurship, and political and economic freedom. Let's seize that opportunity.

I commend the following article to my colleagues.

The article follows:

MANILA'S ECONOMIC REVOLUTIONARY
(By Paul A. Gigot)

MANILA.—As a private businessman three years ago, Jaime V. Ongpin attacked a government bailout of a Ferdinand Marcos crony as "the most obscene, brazen and disgraceful misallocation of taxpayers' money in the history of the Philippines." It didn't matter that the bailout was ordered by his older brother, Roberto, then a cabinet minister.

Today Mr. Ongpin is the new Philippine finance minister, but he still isn't talking in euphemistic terms. Asked about negotiations with the International Monetary Fund, Mr. Ongpin says, "Now that [the IMF] isn't dealing with a bunch of thieves, we hope we won't be treated like a bunch of thieves."

Both comments are vintage Ongpin: candid, principled but loaded with tart derision for what the meddling Marcoses wrought for the Philippine economy. The comments also symbolize the freshest economic thinking to blow through the Philippines in at least 20 years, and maybe ever. As President Corazon Aquino's main economic adviser, Mr. Ongpin will lead the attack on a Marcos legacy that had turned the Philippines into something of a feudal economy, where favors from the throne often determined who would succeed in business. And as a (classical) liberal, Mr. Ongpin hopes to achieve this by sweeping away both government interference and monopolies, by liberating small capitalists and farmers, and by purging any hint of Marcos-style cronyism.

"First of all you dismantle all of this crony structure," the 47-year-old Mr. Ongpin told a handful of reporters over lunch yesterday. "I think government should get out of business completely. Privatize everything. . . . I don't think you need any fancy bag of tricks. All you need to do is say, 'Here's the set of rules. It applies to everybody, fairly, equitably,' I am philosophically committed to the absolute minimum of government interference."

Putting all of this into practice, unfortunately, may take a revolution on the order of last week's at Camp Crame. The Marcos regime gave government interference a bad name, but it also created political forces that won't always, if ever, agree to liberal reform. Some of those forces sit with Mr. Ongpin in President Aquino's new cabinet, a motley and fragile political coalition if ever there was one. Protectionists also lurk here, as everywhere. And there is the left, waiting to make hay if Mr. Ongpin and his allies stumble. The U.S., the IMF, the creditor banks and, especially, most Filipinos will want to see that they don't.

If anyone has to lead these battles, however, it's hard to imagine a better general than Mr. Ongpin. Indeed, friends at Harvard (M.B.A. '62) called him "the general," says his former roommate, because Jaime Ongpin was strong-willed even then. His Jesuit training also made him idealistic, friends say, and he remains so. One prominent Filipino recalls having dinner at the Ongpins' home last year and asserting that Filipinos really did need an authoritarian ruler, to impose order. A heated argument ensued (Mr. Ongpin's wife, Maribel, is said to be as strong-minded as Jaime), and the man says he hasn't been invited back.

For almost 20 years Mr. Ongpin avoided politics, climbing the ladder at a big Philippine mining company, Benguet Corp., rising to president. As the Marcos years lumbered on, however, Mr. Ongpin grew increasingly critical—and vocal. His public blast at his brother marked the first major attack on the Marcos government from the Philippine middle and business classes. His work for the opposition increased until, last week, Mr. Ongpin found himself sleeping on the floor of Camp Crame with the rebels, hoping loyalist soldiers wouldn't attack. "I was never so frightened in my life," he says.

This record of dissent has given him credibility with President Aquino, whose own economic views are unclear, if not unformed. He helped write her major economic policy speeches before last month's election, for example, and Filipinos say he has had significant influence in Mrs. Aquino's choice of other economic advisers. Every one of them shares much of Mr. Ongpin's free-market philosophy.

Mr. Ongpin will need this credibility, because he is certain to face some wrenching political battles. Mostly Roman Catholics, Filipino politicians have long stressed "social justice," often assuming that government action is the only way to achieve it. This view has several supporters in the Aquino cabinet, especially the influential local governments minister, Aquilino Pimentel, a self-professed socialist. Mrs. Aquino herself has also sometimes expressed a vague populism that, if given any rein, could derail market reforms. Mr. Ongpin, for his part, is optimistic, claiming that only one cabinet member is really a statist and that he isn't handling an economic portfolio.

Another threat could come from business nationalists. Throughout the Marcos years, many Filipinos built inefficient business empires behind high tariffs; effective rates of protection remain more than 40 percent, far higher than anywhere else in East Asia. Mr. Ongpin wants to dismantle those trade barriers, saying that "philosophically, I don't believe in protection, period." Instead, he wants to make local businesses more efficient and export-competitive. That view is bound to irk many businessmen, however, and a few have already started griping to the newly free press. Mrs. Aquino's new minister of industry, Jose Concepcion, has wavered from a free-trade stand and his brother, Raul, is among the loudest protectionists.

Mr. Ongpin says the best compromise may be to tell the inefficient that, OK, "we'll buy you a little time. But the minute the economy gets back on its feet . . . that's it." The Aquino government has already asked for, and been granted, a 60-day delay in its current import-liberalization program with the IMF.

The IMF will be a target of economic nationalists for other reasons, too. Because it distrusted the Marcos government, the IMF in 1984 imposed on Manila the toughest austerity package it has ever signed anywhere. Many Filipinos now chafe at the terms, especially because service on the country's $27 billion foreign debt continues to eat up some 50 percent of exports. That austerity and falling commodity prices have caused gross national product to sink nearly 10 percent over the past two years.

Mr. Ongpin wants some IMF relief (thus his comment about thieves), but he doesn't favor any Peruvian-style militancy. "We don't intend to do anything unilaterally," he says. "I don't blame the IMF for what they did. If I were in their shoes, I would have been tougher." His job of selling the IMF accord will be made even more difficult, however, by Mr. Marcos's spending raid on the treasury during the last campaign; sources say Mr. Marcos may have exceeded IMF money-supply targets by as much as $500 million. A new period of austerity will be required to mop up all that inflationary credit.

Mr. Ongpin already has had to expend political capital in this IMF debate. Last week he fought to have Mr. Marcos's Central Bank governor, Jose Fernandez, retained by Mrs. Aquino because, Mr. Ongpin says, he's competent and wasn't personally tainted with mismanagement. As the symbol of austerity, however, Mr. Fernandez is anathema to many businessmen, and a few have already taken to picketing Mrs. Aquino's headquarters in protest.

For all these potential dangers, however, the sense of economic optimism in Manila today is tangible. Though the Aquino government hasn't done much of anything yet, the Philippine peso has already firmed and the Central Bank says gold and dollar transfers (in return for pesos) are at record levels. The stock market a dog for years, has perked up. Demand is already picking up in some of Manila's main housing developments, too, as Filipino expatriates begin to return home. Mr. Ongpin figures there may be as much as $10 billion in Philippine flight capital abroad, waiting to return.

"Our priority is to convince Filipinos to invest in their own country," says Mr. Ongpin, "and we're confident that if we achieve that, the foreign investors will follow."

Indeed, Mr. Ongpin isn't even that eager to take advantage of the "mini-Marshall Plan" in aid for Manila now being talked about in Washington and Tokyo. "I would actually be inclined to start very modestly," he says, "The problems here are to severe and too complex to assume they can be solved by throwing huge amounts of money at them."

He says he wants to solve the economy's structural problems first—dismantle the farm monopolies, make the tax system fairer, implement a land reform based on the successful (and not confiscatory) Malaysian model. And when the aid money does flow, he says, "I would like all of this made available to the private sector"—as equity capital for farmers, perhaps. He doesn't, Mr. Ongpin stresses, want the aid channeled through a government agency that might abuse it for political gain.

"I haven't the slighest doubt in my mind," he says, "that if you just create the right climate, and make sure you're fair . . ." He pauses: "I guess it's the invisible hand. It'll work."

WE NEED A CABINET-LEVEL DEPARTMENT OF TRADE

HON. DAN COATS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation to remedy a problem of critical interest not only to my constituents in northeastern Indiana, but also to the millions of Americans whose jobs and livelihoods depend upon international trade. I refer, of course, to our incoherent and inconsistent system of regulating and monitoring commerce with our trading partners.

My bill would eliminate the confusion which has become almost routine in all facets of our commerce with other nations, and establish a single Department of Trade to unify the trade functions which currently reside in 25 separate executive departments and agencies. I believe this move is necessary, even in today's stringent budgetary environment, because we must highlight the importance of trade as a national economic issue and provide a framework that would allow us to compete in a more organized and aggressive fashion in the international marketplace.

Currently, exports are a vital part of our national economy. The relationship, however, is clouded by the detrimental effect that the current imbalance has on America's businesses. For example, 1 in 8 U.S. manufacturing jobs now relate to exports, 1 in 3 acres of our farmland produces for foreign nations, and 40 percent of all agricultural jobs are linked to exports. In my own district, nearly 50 percent of our crops are exported, and Indiana is second in the Nation in the contribution of foreign trade to personal income at $1,767 per person.

On the flip side, however, our substantial trade imbalance, estimated at more than $150 billion in 1985, is sapping strength from our economy. The adverse impact that this deficit has on our commerce and business is an issue that must be addressed immediately if we are to continue the economic growth which we have enjoyed in the recent past.

One of the most important means of stemming the flow of American capital abroad is to increase the competitiveness of our industries in foreign markets and help them get back some of what we have lost. Under the current hodgepodge of agencies with jurisdiction over trade, it is difficult to establish a comprehensive plan to boost our business, and nearly impossible to execute in a coherent fashion whatever initiatives do come forth out of the current maze surrounding international commerce.

The formation of a separate Department of Trade would have the twin benefits of highlighting the importance of the issue and providing centralization of the trade functions of our Government to place authority into a single office that would be able to effectively promote our goods and services abroad. I believe that this would be a giant step forward toward restoring America to its role at the forefront of world commerce and trade, and reinforce our economic growth for years to come.

VOICE OF DEMOCRACY

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, as you know, every year the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and the Ladies' Auxiliary sponsor a wonderful essay contest called the Voice of Democracy scriptwriting contest. Each student writes an essay based on a common theme and the winning contestant from each State is brought to Washington, DC for the final judging as a guest of the VFW.

This year's theme was "New Horizons for America's Youth." I am proud to submit the winning essay from the State of Alaska written by David Michael Stevens of Soldotna. David's essay won second place honors in the contest and I am sure you will enjoy it as I did. David is a senior at Soldotna High School in Soldotna, AK, and hopes to attend the California Institute of Technology where he will study engineering. He has received many awards and held several offices while attending high school. He has a 4.0 grade point average, works with the school theater's technical staff and has a job with a local radio station.

David's essay follows:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

(By David Stevens)

In 1492, three ships set sail from a Port in Spain to test the horizon. A young man named Christopher Columbus had dared to challenge the accepted belief that beyond the point where sky met sea there was nothing. Because of his challenge, a new horizon was opened. This new horizon came to be America, where determined people with a flare for challenge and adventure eventually founded a new nation. This nation itself was a challenge against accepted beliefs; it was the first nation of its size to be governed by the masses. Such is the heritage of America; to challenge the accepted, to push back the horizon.

The horizons that America's youth face today are wide and diverse. One example of a horizon that must be faced is the energy horizon. Where will we get energy in the future? How will we replenish the energy we consume? What new sources of energy will be discovered? What new uses for energy will be invented? This is just one horizon that we, as America's youth, must face. Many more horizons present themselves with each rise in life's road. How will we handle diplomatic relations with other countries? What will we do about world hunger? What will we do about domestic poverty? Will we begin to colonize space? Can we stop the arms race? Can we find cures for presently incurable diseases? As medicine makes more and more advances in artificial organry, will we be able to push back death? And most importantly, as each of these questions is answered, what new questions will the answers present?

Such are the horizons that tomorrow's leaders, America's youth, will strive to confront and overcome. Throughout history, Americans have defeated their boundaries and led the way to new horizons. Americans were the first people to set up wide scale democracy. It was an American who first invented standardized parts. An American was the first to run a boat upstream. It was an American who first produced the automobile. Americans were the first to fly. An American team opened the door to the Atomic Age. Americans were the first to break the sound barrier. Americans were the first to set foot on the moon. And it is America that is reopening space for mankind with the introduction of the Space Shuttle. All of these events marked the passing of one horizon, and the rise of many more. I have faith that the horizons looming before America now will, like those that loomed before, be reached, and surpassed. I have faith that world peace will be established. I have faith that world hunger will be satiated. I have faith that diseases yet incurable will be cured. I have faith in America's youth and their ability to meet the challenges of their new horizons; horizons that, like the illusive rainbow, are never reached, but only continue to recede.

THE RUNAWAY TRADE DEFICIT

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, I have sensed a growing concern among my colleagues about the issue of trade and just what needs to be done to allow us to gain control of our runaway trade deficit. I realize that there may be disagreement as to what the solution to our trade problems is, but I want to bring to the attention of my fellow Members one of the causes of the anything but fair trade policy that now exists in this Nation.

The heart of America's industrial base is being undermined by many individuals in Washington, DC, who used to work for the Reagan administration but who have since left the public sector only to lobby Congress and the administration on behalf of foreign countries, attempting to get trade policies that will help their foreign clients. I am very concerned about the amount of influence that these individuals exert over their friends in the administration. Many have unlimited access to the policymakers in the White House. Their involvement oftentimes leads to the acceptance of trade policies that are not in the best interest of American industry, to say the very least, and more often benefit countries like Japan and Korea, which alone account for one-third of our staggering trade deficit.

I would like to point out that Japan alone spends over $60 million annually on Washington lobbyists. And, of course, there is the case of long-time adviser and close personal friend of the President's Michael Deaver, whose pulic relations firm is paid $475,000 a year by a Korean group representing their government and certain businesses. There are many other glaring examples of this type of activities, as well.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this type of activity is a blatant case of conflict of interest and a gross violation of ethics in the White House of which the American people should be aware.

RAIL RETIREES BENEFITS BEING ERODED

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, railroad retirees all over the country are expressing great concern about the new budget proposals outlined by the President for fiscal year 1987.

Their railroad retirement fund, which has been included in the Federal budget since 1969 along with Social Security, is to remain in the budget even though Social Security now takes a separate path. As a result, railroad retirees are now in line for cuts in their hard-earned benefits under the Gramm-Rudman law to eliminate the national deficit.

Our colleague from New Jersey, Rep. JAMES J. FLORIO, in a recent news article, pointed out that "about 1 million railroad retirees nationwide will be drastically affected" by such a move.

The importance of this issue is unquestionable and as he further points out to pretend to balance the Federal budget by depriving people of their hard-earned retirement benefits which they have paid for is undeniably unfair.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain many of our colleagues would agree on this point, therefore, I commend the following New Jersey News Tribune article by Mary Farmer to the attention of our colleagues for their review.

[From the News Tribune, Feb. 13, 1986]

GLOWING WITH AGE

(By Mary Farmer)

RAHWAY.—Railroad retirees are troubled by the new budget proposals outlined by President Reagan in his State of the Union address

Their Railroad Retirement Fund that has been included in the federal budget since 1969 along with Social Security is to remain in the budget even though Social Security gets to ride a separate track.

"We got left behind. Now we're in line for cuts in our benefits under the Gramm-Rudman law to eliminate the national deficit," said Harold Kendler of Red Bank.

Kendler serves as legislative representative of the 300-member Retired Railroaders Group 2 that meets regularly in the Rahway Senior Citizens Center.

"The president has based his budget proposals on that legislation and it's bad legislation," he said.

A concern of the railroaders is that the cost of living increase (COLA) in the private pension portion of the Railroad Retirement System (Tier II) will be eliminated. Also, taxes will be increased on benefits.

It was pointed out by Rep. James J. Florio (D.-N.J.), majority member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, in an earlier statement, that "about one million railroad retirees nationwide will be drastically affected. And to pretend to balance the budget by depriving people of the hard-earned retirement benefits which they have paid for is unfair."

Ironically, railroad retirees and those still working on the railroad along with the railroad companies themselves came to their own rescue just three years ago when the Railroad Retirement System was faced with severe financial difficulty.

Florio related, "Sacrifices were made. Benefits were reduced. Contributions from both the workers and the employers were increased. And the system was made to be financially sound."

"Problems had begun in 1983 with a recession-induced drop in employment," Florio explained. "But Congress enacted the Railroad Retirement Solvency Act that year based on an agreement between rail labor and management. It included significant sacrifices by railroad retirees, one of which was postponement of cost-of-living adjustments."

Benefits of the Railroad Retirement System are paid out of a trust fund from payroll taxes paid by railroad workers and employers. The system is administered by the Railroad Retirement Board headquartered in Chicago.

All railroad retirees receive a benefit with two components. These are "Tier I" which is comparable to Social Security; and "Tier II" which is comparable to a private pension.

Under current law, Tier I has received the same COLA as social security.

Tier II receives a 32.5 percent (one-third) of the Social Security COLA. Thus, if the Social Security COLA is 3 percent, the Tier I COLA is 3 percent and the Tier II COLA one percent.

Tier I benefits are subject to income taxation like social security benefits (but only if total income is above a certain level) and Tier II and dual benefits are subject to tax just like a private pension.

"What the Reagan administration hasn't realized is that railroad retirees had been paying out more from their earnings than what social security took out from other people's salaries," said Al Gehrum of Iselin, a member of the area retirees group.

"During my worklife, 10 percent of my salary was being taken out for the railroad retirement system. Social Security meanwhile was taking 2 or 3 percent then," he disclosed. "Now, we're being faced with cuts out of a good portion of our retirement checks. And what's more, there's less money going into the pension fund ever since Amtrak experienced the loss of thousands of jobs."

According to Kendler, "We have to act now to back our supporters in Washington like Congressman Florio and Senators John Heinz, Bill Bradley and Frank Lautenberg. This means getting off our backsides and being serious. By next year when the cuts will start, it may be too late for us."

A GREAT JOB APPRECIATED

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, distinguished colleagues and friends, it is a rare privilege for me to have the honor to call to your attention so exemplary and accomplished a public servant as David H. Pingree has been to the people of the State of Florida as secretary of the Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services from 1979 until this year.

Secretary Pingree and I have exchanged views and information leading to the introduction of a number of proposals and programs in Congress and to the passage of various provisions improving to a great extent the delivery and targeting of health care services to the elderly of this country and of Florida. He has been a dynamic gatherer and a creative analyzer of facts, trends, budgetary options and innovative concepts helping the aged, the handicapped and the many other in our society who need help desperately through no fault of their own.

He has been alert to opportunities arising in the work of Congress as well as our Florida Legislature, where he successfully developed support for new or expanded programs for child care, health services and aid to the elderly, and the poor.

Until the advent of the infamous Gramm-Rudman law, which I did not support because I believe it is not in accord with the Constitution, Secretary Pingree has succeeded in improving the performance of this fine department in each year, building public confidence and a greater degree of public commitment to its increasingly effective and compassionate functioning.

I am sorry that David Pingree was not given increased resources with which to do more and better things of the kind he has so ably done for all those in society who are in the shadow of life—whose misfortune it has become to suffer a lack of inadequate nutrition, housing, medicine, care, education, training, opportunity, and humane concern such as this man wholeheartedly and with superb capacity has devoted to them.

By serving in this exemplary way, Secretary Pingree has served our State in the highest degree and also he has served well our national interest. Just the other day, as some of you know, I testified before the House Budget Committee on the ill conception of the administration's additional proposals for budget rescissions and deferrals. I quoted the letter to me of a young couple from my district, whose elderly mother had suffered two strokes and while able to move around required constant attention. This would require one of the two young people to quit his or her job and cease contributing to the country's economy to stay at home and watch this dear older one who shares their home all day. Instead she has been under the group care of an Adult Day Care Program during the work day, saving money over the higher cost of full institutionalization and allowing the mother to be with her children mornings and evenings and at night, allowing as well the younger people to go out and earn a living, teaching school. Now the President, with a sweeping cut, will end all that family way of life for this little family helping one another with a little assistance saving the country a lot while working to help others.

Well, David, I convey to you my highest commendation and esteem for all you have done and will continue to do and congratulate you on your accomplishment as secretary of health and rehabilitative services in Florida.

SECRETARY PINGREE RESIGNS

David H. Pingree, secretary of Florida's Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services (HRS) from 1979-1980 and 1981-1986, leaves February 28 to enter the private sector. With his departure, Florida loses one of its most knowledgeable, capable and dedicated public servants. Florida's human service agency, with an annual budget of $3.2 billion and over 33,000 employees, is a model nationally for its unified, decentralized and integrated delivery of health, social and rehabilitation services to abused, neglected and delinquent children; the mentally ill; the aged and disabled; those who are addicted to drugs and alcohol; the mentally retarded and those living in poverty. David Pingree's leadership during his earlier tenure at staff director of the Committee on Health and Rehabilitative Services of the Florida House of Representatives and his more than 10 years as a top level administrator in HRS has been instrumental in allowing the state to meet the challenges presented by major cuts in federal and state funding, a severe and continuing immigration crisis, and AIDS. His focus has always been on finding solutions to human need. He will be sorely missed.

A native of Boston, Mass., Pingree graduated from high school in Winchester, Mass., in 1957. He attended Harvard University for three years before transferring to Drew University where he received a bachelor's degree in political science in 1963. He has done graduate work at Emory University in Atlanta and doctoral work at Florida State University.

In 1960 he was named as a delegate to the White House Conference on Children and Youth and in the same year was elected a member of Winchester, Mass., Annual Town Meeting.

He is a member of the American Society for Public Administration and in 1984 received the group's National Public Service Award. He is also a member of the American Political Science Association. Pingree has two daughters and a son.

HRS' PINGREE SAYS HE'S RESIGNING AT END OF MONTH

(By Bill Cotterell)

Secretary of Health and Rehabilitative Services David Pingree, who has headed Florida's largest state agency through an era of growing need and shrinking budgets, said Tuesday that he would resign at the end of this month.

Gov. Bob Graham appointed Florida State University Professor William "Pete" Page Jr., one of Pingree's predecessors in the giant social services agency, to succeed him March 1, Page, 58, who headed HRS through the second administration of former Gov. Reubin Askew, is now a professor of public administration and social work at FSU.

Pingree, 46, announced at a meeting of HRS executives he would leave the department Feb. 28 to become vice president for development of state, local and international business for Burroughs Corp. in Detroit. He said he would help expand the nation's No. 2 computer company's business with state governments, but would not approach any of his HRS appointees about buying Burroughs business machines.

Although he expressed dissatisfaction with Florida's per-capita spending for the poor, elderly and ill, Pingree said he was not quiting out of any sense of frustration. He said he long ago told the governor he intended to leave at the end of the Graham administration next January, but that the Burroughs opportunity came up unexpectedly in the last two months.

He declined to disclose his Burroughs salary, but said it was more than the $73,000 a year the HRS secretary's job pays. Pingree said he admired Burroughs because "it's a company with a social conscience," headed by former Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal.

Pingree was a consultant on intergovernmental relations in Atlanta before becoming staff director of the House HRS Committee in the early 1970s. When Graham became governor in 1978, he chose Pingree to succeed Page as secretary of HRS.

Pingree headed HRS until mid-1980, when he moved to the governor's office as deputy chief of staff. Graham named him chief of staff in September 1981, but sent him back to HRS a month later when then-Secretary Alvin Taylor resigned.

Pingree said he would make recommendations to Graham by the end of this month for reducing administrative costs in HRS, in compliance with federally mandated strictures of the Gramm-Rudman deficit-reduction law. He said the size of the cuts was not yet known, but that he hoped the first round of reductions could be absorbed through restricting agency travel and lowering some administrative payments—not cutting services to the needy.

He said the 1986 Florida Legislature would have to put up extra money to tide HRS over between July 1, the end of the state financial year, and the Oct. 1 start of the new federal financial year, when a new round of federal cuts in social spending is anticipated.

Pingree said his greatest satisfaction at HRS came as a result of the Legislature's support of new or expanded programs for child care, health services and aid to the elderly and poor. The low point, he said, came last summer, when 16 HRS employees were disciplined—and some resigned—after the death of an infant who had been placed by HRS in an overcrowded foster-care home in Treasure Island.

Pingree said the Graham administration had been able to streamline paperwork procedures within the vast HRS agency, but that the level of state services provided to needy children and unemployed adults was still inadequate.

"Florida is considered to be in the top five states in the management of human services, and yet it's in the bottom five states in the funding per capita that we provide for human services," Pingree said.

FOREIGN TRADE PRACTICES ACT

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation designed to clarify the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

With a trade deficit of over $148 billion, improved access to foreign markets should be one of our Nation's priorities. While our trading partners offer incentives and export promotion programs, we have impediments and barriers. The list of export disincentives is long. One of the most complex and confusing is the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

Like most other export disincentives, the FCPA was implemented with noble intentions. Following public disclosure of in the mid-1970's that U.S. multinational corporations had paid bribes to high-ranking foreign government officials, the Congress reacted. The result was a law that makes the United States the only nation in the world to impose a comprehensive extraterritorial antibribery law upon all of its foreign business practices.

From its inception, the FCPA has created problems for law-abiding companies engaged in international transactions. The law itself is difficult to decipher, hard to enforce, and has created confusion for both regulators and business people.

The overall purpose of this legislation is to eliminate ambiguities that have been troubling to our export community, and at the same time retain the absolutely necessary prohibitions against bribery of foreign government officals now found in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

My bill would establish certain restrictions on payments to foreign government officials in the course of export trade and would direct the executive branch to undertake negotiation of an international agreement governing business payments to foreign officals.

Mr. Speaker, my bill would double the existing fines for prohibited payments. Having clarified the kinds of payments and other actions that are unacceptable for American businesses, I think it is appropriate and necessary to strengthen the deterrent against illicit practices in international business.

This legislation would require repeal of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, replacing it with similar provisions in the Export Administration Act. Responsibility for its administration and enforcement would be transferred from the Securities and Exchange Commission to the Department of Commerce.

Mr. Speaker, I commend this legislation to all of my colleagues who share my feeling that we can no longer afford to sacrifice exports and the jobs that exports generate by unduly restricting our exporters. I believe this proposal will strongly discourage illicit payments to foreign officials without such costly disruptions of trade as have resulted from the ambiguities of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

AMY CUSHMAN, VIRGINIA WINNER "VOICE OF DEMOCRACY"

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, Amy Cushman, a 12th grade student from Monacan High School in my district, has won a $1,000 scholarship from the Veterans of Foreign Wars Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program. Amy's essay received a sixth place award out of 250,000 entries. I and all of the residents of my district are very proud of Amy and of her goals for herself and for America. Amy's essay should be an inspiration to us all, and I would like to share it with you now. The essay follows:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

As a child my favorite song was "Somewhere over the Rainbow" from the famous movie, The Wizard of Oz. It's most memorable lines to me are "Somewhere over the rainbow, skies are blue." And the dreams that you dare to dream really do come true. I never understood the true meaning of these words until we began studying the works of men such as Paine, Jefferson and Washington in my senior government class. These were men who dared to dream. Today our country is based on an American dream and the new horizons for America's youth today are unlimited.

There are others in our American history that dared to dream and who have shown us countless opportunities and horizons. Martin Luther King announced to the world, "I have a dream" and he dared to visualize how racial equality could become a reality. John F. Kennedy, our 35th President, dared the people of America to commit themselves when he said, "Ask not what your country can do for you. Ask what you can do for your country". He dared to dream about a better America.

Buzz Aldren and Neil Armstrong took that one small step for man and one giant leap for mankind. These men dared to dream and expanded their horizon to the unexplored world of outer space.

The youngest symbol of an American youth going for a "10" is Mary Lou Retton. In the 1984 Olympics, her spirit and exuberance were uncontained. She dared to dream.

I too dare to dream and seek new horizons in my education and in my future career. As Shakespeare once said, "Strong reasons make strong actions". The lessons, beliefs and basic freedoms our forefathers have left us marked the beginning of the United States expansion. Based on those principles, men like Martin Luther King were able to pronounce, "I have a dream", and seek racial equality in America. The first men to walk on the moon set out to conquer space and showed us we could achieve almost anything. Like Mary Lou Retton we should all try for a "10" and be the best that we can be.

In my chosen field of communications and media, I pledge to help others seek and find the American dream and to maintain the great principles this country was founded on.

By becoming involved in school and community affairs, I can expand my horizons and help not only others, but myself as well. As a young woman, I am formulating my own ideas of the world and their places in it. I am exploring my feelings, hopes and dreams and wondering where they will fit into the larger world beyond it.

I belong to the Parent Teacher and Student Association which stresses the importance of education and the knowledge of what's going on in the world. Other organizations such as the National Forensic League and the Speech Communications Association reflect the concerns of my generation and attempt to provide us with the communication tools needed for succeeding in our present environment as well as exploring our future horizons.

The final lines of "Somewhere over the Rainbow" are "If birds fly over the rainbow, why oh why can't I? The answer now is clear. I can. I can dare to dream and I can achieve that dream.

PANAMANIAN DILEMMA

HON. WEBB FRANKLIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. FRANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, I have had the opportunity to become familiar with the Panama Canal, and with the U.S. role in operating and using that canal under the 1977 Canal Treaties.

I think the United States Congress and the American people need to understand that the terms of our future relationship with Panama and with the canal are not particularly clear cut. Our committee has had several discussions with the Panamanian Legislative Committee which is responsible for oversight of the canal, and based on my observation, I am concerned that Panama and the United States may have different ideas on the future of that canal.

We have a number of problems which must be worked out if the U.S. interests in the canal are to be protected after 1999. Capt. G. Russell Evans, a retired Coast Guard officer, has outlined many of those concerns in a recent article, and I think his analysis is an accurate one.

[From the Ledger-Star, Feb. 7, 1986]

CANAL TREATIES—PANAMANIAN DILEMMA

(By G. Russell Evans)

When things go wrong in the Republic of Panama, the United States is often blamed.

Recently, according to a foreign broadcast from Panama City, the U.S. State Department was charged with a "seditious scheme" against the country, provoking internal problems, and "discrediting" the military. But the problems were all generated by the all-powerful Panamanian Defense Forces (formerly the Guardia) through their implication in drug trafficking and murder of the patriot, Dr. Hugo Spadafora. Guardia Commander Manuel Noriega forced President Nicolas Barletta to resign when the latter was about to investigate the Guardia, and then appointed his own man, Eric Arturo del Valle, to the presidency.

Such is the immediate background for the State Department's latest attempt to squeeze maximum benefits for the Panamanians out of the 1977 Canal Treaties. And if Secretary George Shultz has his way, U.S. taxpayers could literally buy the canal all over again, even help pay for a sea-level canal.

These possibilities will be examined in a four-year study by the U.S., Japan, and Panama starting in 1986. The costs would be some $20 to $30 million for the study, up to $4 billion for modernization and $20 to $25 billion for a sea-level (tidal lock) canal.

The State Department recently agreed to this ambitious trilateral involvement, the 18th study in the canal's history. This commitment could produce recommendations that the U.S. pay billions of dollars for massive improvements to a canal soon to be lost—or for a new sea-level waterway capable of handling 300,000-ton tankers, as compared with 65,000 in the present canal, that is, a colossal new wonder of the world.

Sea-level advocates, apparently unconcerned about unresearched ecological hazards, are getting the publicity, and are calling for alternatives rather than solutions to the demonstrated problems of marine operations in the existing Canal.

A solution, enthusiastically endorsed by the pilots and engineers with extensive canal operating experience, has been developed by retired Navy Capt. Miles P. DuVal Jr. It is the Terminal Lake/Third Locks Plan, called best for engineering and safest for navigation, already partially completed and once approved all the way to the White House.

Basically, the DuVal Plan would remove the Pedro Miguel Locks and elevate Miraflores Lake and Gatun Lake from 87 to 92 feet, thereby providing uninterrupted passage between the Atlantic locks and the Pacific locks. It would add a third set of locks, straighten the channel, and widen Gaillard Cut. The first order of business for the Shultz study group should be the DuVal Plan.

The 1977 Treaties provide for (not guarantee), joint studies in Article XII of the basic treaty, but do not commit the U.S. to spend a dime for additions to a waterway that presumably will pass to Panamanian ownership in 1999, despite abundant evidence of invalid treaties. Some writers have incorrectly asserted that the treaties guarantee U.S. founding for the studies and modernization. But considering the crumbling Panamanian economy and the generosity of the U.S. State Department, there is little doubt that the United States will be expected to pay for both the Panamanian and U.S. shares of the feasibility study and whatever modernizations are recommended—unless U.S. voters rebel.

Obviously, Secretary Shultz is exceeding the terms of the treaties. He would even exclude representatives of the Defense Department and the Panama Canal Commission from participation as members of the U.S. commission.

Rep. Webb Franklin, R-Miss., has asked questions: Why has the State Department, and not the Corps of Engineers, taken the lead role in what is essentially an engineering study? Is it in our best interests to conclude a study so long before the canal transfer when a later study could provide more leverage in negotiations? This latter question relates to the need for U.S. bases in Panama to defend the canal on scene, after 1999 when, by the treaties, the U.S. Southern Command and all other military forces are to be expelled. Take note: After 1999, the sovereign nation of Panama is free to call on Cuba, Nicaragua, and the Soviet Union to operate the former American canal, improve it or dig another—thanks to the Carter-Torrijos Treaties.

Mr. Franklin and the chairman of the House Panama Canal subcommittee, Mike Lowry, D-Wash., have introduced legislation (HR 3882) to curb the State Department zealots and to find out why the U.S. military and the present operators of the canal, the members of the Panama Canal Commission, are denied input, as commission members, to the feasibility study. Their bill would restrict the study to the explicit terms of the treaties, and would establish guidelines, limitations and funding.

Japan, a co-equal partner in this latest canal study, is the best customer, with 30 percent of cargo-ship transits, and will doubtless insist on full protection for any investments. So should the United States, unequivocally, and with absolute and irreversible guarantees of national security benefits. These are benefits and guarantees, unfortunately, that are not contained in the 1977 Panama treaties, not even with the present status of the DeConcini Reservation, which was to provide U.S. defense rights, but were voided by Panama's secret counter-reservation to the treaties. In the 13 short years until 1999, the United States will face delicate problems concerning the canal, among them: (1) getting along with the Guardia dictatorship, (2) striking some kind of bargain on canal modernization and U.S. security, and (3) controlling the runaways in the U.S. State Department.

NED PRAISED BY THE NEW REPUBLIC

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, the National Endowment for Democracy is one of the world's most useful organizations for furthering the spread of free government and free labor unions.

Recently the editors of the New Republic outlined the virtues of the endowment, and pointed to a number of its successes. The article is excellent, and I wish to lay it before my colleagues. I take issue with it in one respect alone: There is no good reason why the Democratic and Republican parties ought not play a role in the direction of the endowment. Afterall, they are our most experienced hands in the world of politics.

The article follows:

[From the New Republic, Jan. 20, 1096]

PLANTING SEEDS OF FREEDOM

Democracy may be less a choice that societies make than the result of a very limited variety of circumstances and histories. If this is so, one consequence is that the number of democracies in the world, and their resilience, is not likely to increase greatly. Another consequence is that the longtime grievance against American foreign policy—that the U.S. reflexively allies itself with undemocratic regimes and movements in parts of the world not yet at home with modernity or constitutionalism—loses much of its moral force. For if arbitrary rule is the destiny of the billions of people born outside the ambit of John Locke, then the character of our ties to other states may be judged primarily by the standards of realpolitik.

Those who reject the standards of realpolitik as callous and counter-historical must have a theory of how the great transformation can take place from governments that disregard the rights and trample the liberties of their people to governments that respect them. How does it happen?

Before 1917 and since, it has been thought by many millions of militants, and by more timid folk too, that revolution would do the trick. But in most countries that have experienced revolution, the result has been the increasing immiseration of the populace and its submission to forms of domination that are often more brutal, and only occasionally more subtle. The spark ignited by Lenin in Russia 70 years ago, therefore, no longer glows so brightly. The fires that spread from it have consumed too many lives and too much hope. The moral cachet of revolution hasn't survived the conflagration, at least among people who have seen it up close. This is the meaning of Solidarity, and of Charta 77, and indeed of the whole incandescently nonviolent underground in Central and Eastern Europe.

But from afar, the prospect of salvation by fire still has its enthusiasts. Thus the El Salvador guerrilla movement recently proclaimed itself to be what any astute observer already knew it was, a Marxist-Leninist vanguard. Given the bloody histories of such vanguards, this is uncommon fair warning. More often these days, the agrarian reformer disguise is not shed until the rebels sit in the seats of the mighty. By then it is too late; a democratic future is all but foreclosed.

Of course the struggle for democracy must still be waged against traditional privilege, as well as against the mesmerizing delusions of revolution. But democrats are always at a disadvantage when they compete with the ruthless. That is one reason why indigenous democratic forces are justified in expecting more than mere handwringing and moral support from mature democratic societies. They are entitled to concrete assistance. The United States succored the revival of democracy in postwar Europe and presided over its very creation in postwar Japan. Surely we should not be indifferent to the ordeal of struggling democrats around the world today.

The National Endowment for Democracy, a government-funded independent foundation, is an appropriate vehicle for solidarity with precisely such democrats who need help. It is an instrument of practical justice. The existence of NED does not preclude similar voluntary efforts by the vast networks of voluntary associations so characteristic of our democracy. What American churches are doing in South Africa is very similar to the mission envisioned by the legislation establishing the Endowment. But great public goals are never fulfilled solely by private action. Those who rightly criticize President Reagan's instinct to "privatize" every public purpose in the domestic arena seem worse than silly—and perhaps even insincere—when they argue that public solidarity with struggling democrats in the international arena should not be expressed in public acts or with public funds. Such abnegation would help only the dictatorships. The democrats of Spain and Portugal, once right-wing authoritarian regimes that are now full members of the brotherhood of democratic states, know just how important U.S. government assistance was in keeping them alive during the Franco and Salazar years. That assistance was directed to them by the CIA—yes, the CIA. And these were precisely the people who steered their countries away from the habits of fascism and the temptations of communism, into the constitutional mainstream of Western Europe. NED hopes that its support will sustain similar circles of democrats and their democratic activities in countries where the future has not yet been settled.

If you scrutinize any public or private bureaucracy, you are likely to find that it has made some mistakes. This is particularly so with a new agency. It turned out, for example, that the AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union Institute, using NED funds, has appropriated large sums to two French organizations, one of which has a shadowy history dating back to the pieds noirs of French Algeria. Reasonable questions might be raised about why U.S. money should be spent in vibrantly democratic France at all; there are also reasonable justifications for doing so. In any case, these particular errors, if errors they were, resulted from the initial legislation that gave NED little direct control over the congressionally mandated appropriations to the FTUI. In the new legislation continuing NED funding, this structural flaw has been corrected. (The flaw that puts arms of the Democratic and Republican parties into the decisionmaking process has not been corrected.)

By focusing on the French cases, however, critics tried to put into question the entire enterprise. This is fair neither to FTUI nor to NED. A few idiosyncratic connections notwithstanding, the historic role of the American trade union movement in bolstering trade unionism and democratic values internationally—and especially in the Third World, where a special sensitivity to the peasant sensibility was required—is nothing less than exhilarating.

NED has been functioning for a bit more than two years. It has assisted democrats in the Communist world and those driven into exile from it. The proportion of funds expended in such work has been small. In fact, the great burden of its funded activities has been in the less developed countries where false clichés have the U.S. collaborating against social and political change. Here the very idea of pluralist institutions must seem like something of a dream. But encouraging the critical habits of the press or the adversary stance of lawyers is just the kind of encouragement these societies need if freedom is to have a chance. Often NED supports democratic developments in countries whose governments, hardly unfriendly to the U.S., would prefer not to see democracy developing at all. This is essential to NED's purpose. This is the case now in the Philippines, where fully ten percent of NED's money is going. It is also the case in Paraguay, Chile, South Africa, and other countries where it takes bravery to want social and political change. To match the bravery of the kind of people we should want to help, NED may have to be more daring than public agencies are prone to be.

In Guatemala, NED aid was critical in mobilizing the population for the recent election, which has given that country its first hope in decades of ending the reign of terror. The election won't guarantee that democracy will flourish. But it has emboldened vast numbers of people, across the rigid stratifications of a poor and frightened polity, to believe that there is another way to live.

Such emboldening is the absolute precondition for democratic change. Without NED, the U.S. has no way to embolden the hopeless except with empty rhetoric or with guns.

CHANGES IN HEALTH CARE

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, Dr. John F. Seidensticker of Chillicothe, OH, has provided an incisive overview of the various costs associated with our Nation's health care system. In his article, which appeared in the Chillicothe Gazette, Dr. Seidensticker indicates how our health care system has changed over the years. Moreover, he has noted the effect of these changes on health care costs in the areas of medical malpractice, third party reimbursement of medical care, and cost containment.

In my view, Dr. Seidensticker has a unique perspective regarding this situation. He is the past president of the Ross County Ohio Medical Society and the past chief of staff of Medical Center Hospital in Chillicothe, OH. He has generously shared his thoughts and recommendations with the people of his community on this subject. Moreover, I think his insights warrant the attention of all Members of Congress. I have provided this article for their consideration.

HEALTH CARE HAS CHANGED, AND NOT ALL OF IT IS FOR THE BETTER

(By Dr. John F. Seidensticker)

This is an open letter to all people who are currently patients, those who may become patients, and to anyone who is involved in the medical system. Times have changed! Technologic advances, surgical procedures, medications, ancillary and supportive care all have improved and will continue to add to the ability to provide better medical care. These changes make our lives better—but they also make life more complicated and expensive. In addition, numerous other circumstances and events influence and dictate medical practice.

There are three basic areas of concern that we need to try to thoroughly understand: (1.) the medical malpractice crisis, (2.) third-party intervention in medical care (e.g. federal government—Medicare, private insurance companies involvement, industry involvement), HMOs (Health Maintenance Organizations), PPOs (Preferred Provider Organizations), IPAs (Independent Providers Association), and (3.) cost containment.

I would like to address these items in further detail.

MALPRACTICE CRISIS

We are living in a litigious era—no question. If something goes wrong, our first thought can be to sue. If we have an accident, we sue. If something doesn't work right, we sue. If we smoke for 40 years and get cancer, we sue the cigarette company. On and on. This mentality is especially prevalent now in the medical profession.

Physicians cannot practice medicine and assure that the result of each patient-physician encounter is perfect health. The best we can do is attempt to make a reasonably educated diagnosis and offer a reasonably educated solution to the problem. The stresses resulting from potential error for each patient-physician contact can result in a less than satisfactory future relationship. The need to practice "defensive medicine" (the ordering of X-rays, tests and consultation with other physicians to try to triple-check ourselves and attempt to ensure that we don't miss anything) will only result in further escalation of medical costs.

This cycle has to be interrupted. You, our patients, need to be made aware of the result of increased costs to the patient in the immediate future and over the long haul if this scourge of malpractice is not removed from the everyday practice of medicine.

THIRD-PARTY INTERVENTION

This is now a fact of life and reality. The most distressing aspect is the federal government's freeze on payment for services provided to Medicare patients. We have been placed in a situation in which we cannot increase our fees as we deem necessary to Medicare patients. (There is an alternative—accept Medicare "assignment"—we have tried this approach and found it unworkable.)

The freeze payment covers all services to Medicare patients and is in effect for an indefinite period. In the meantime, patients who are not receiving Medicare are being charged the usual and customary fees; this results in a two-tier system of medical care. That is separate charges for the same service or less service to a whole class of patients. This is exactly what none of us desires, either those providing the care or those receiving the care.

If the current freeze continues for any period of time, the discrepancy of payment between Medicare and non-Medicare patients will increase further, a situation which we feel is intolerable.

Another result of third-party intervention is the development of organizations such as HMOs, PPOs, IPAs, etc. These organizations are developing nationwide to provide alternative health care delivery systems. The systems are being formed at urging from the federal government, industry and insurance companies and medical groups. These "alternative care delivery systems" are going to be with us in the future, and in fact will provide welcome competition to the traditional fee for service-type medicine.

These systems are not all good. But again, they are not all bad. The result, however, is development of a different fee schedule for members as dictated by the contracts that are drawn between the parties. Depending on the specifics, the patients will be provided with different services. This results in a third tier of medical care!

COST CONTAINMENT

Finally we have the issue of cost containment, which all agree is a necessity. By cost containment we mean that physicians are being urged to provide the most complete and optimal medical care at the least expense. We are encouraged to avoid unnecessary hospitalization, testing or X-rays.

Of course, the definition "unnecessary" is a judgment that can only be made by the physician on a case-by-case basis. All would agree that cost containment is judicious and necessary, but we have a problem in that as we attempt to provide economical and practical care, we can't afford to "miss anything" because of the threat of malpractice.

Most patients will opt for the latest and best science has to offer if it is their own illness—especially if their insurance pays for it—but the public raises eyebrows at the total cost of medical care. This obviously is a no-win situation.

In the past when a patient came to a physician for medical care, the physician used a common sense, practical approach, keeping in mind the best interest of the patient, both medically and economically. Now the burden falls on the physician not to miss anything that might be causing the problem. Therefore, defensive medicine is deemed necessary.

This occurs because if anything is found later that could have been picked up a little earlier, "everything" has been done to establish the proper diagnosis at the earliest moment. Cost containment places extreme stress on the medical care providers. This has to result in a loss of the traditional close relationship between the patient and the physician. This is a lamentable situation for all us.

We realize that times are changing, that the expectations of patients are in an evolving pattern. And we realize that there is a place for legitimate compensation for true malpractice and that the medical profession needs to have the tools to better police itself. We realize that there are no immediate solutions to the problems. We also realize that our patients—the public—need to be aware of the potential ramifications for all of us if solutions aren't forthcoming.

We need to let legislators know our desires and thoughts. We need to have some resolution that is equitable to both the patient and medical care providers—a solution that will eliminate the need for defensive medicine. We also must address the possibility of Medicare patients effectively becoming second-class citizens insofar as medical care is concerned unless Congress acts soon.

The medical profession is not perfect and not without blame for problems, past and present. No profession is without its bad apples. Some physicians have profited excessively from the care of the sick—no argument. My firm belief is that most physicians are providing the highest quality medical care. We are trying to provide the best care to our patients in a changing environment. We would like to take care of patients and forget the external problems. We ask for your help and suggestions so that future generations of Americans will have a close patient-physician relationship and the highest quality of medical care as we have known it in past decades.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY 1986—A DAY OF REFLECTION AND RECOMMITMENT

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, each March 17, the world's citizens join in varied celebrations and events in recognition of St. Patrick's Day. In this country alone, Americans from all walks of life, from all cultures, take time to pay tribute to the rich traditions of the nation and people of Ireland. Indeed our President and the distinguished Speaker of our House of Representatives, Mr. O'NEILL, are just 2 of the 40 million Irish-Americans who have contributed their talents to make this such a great Nation. St. Patrick's Day not only affords all of us the opportunity to honor our Irish-American heritage, however, but to recommit and rededicate ourselves to the continuing effort to achieve a real and lasting peace in Northern Ireland.

This past year has been both one of great frustration and/or great hope in the long fight to attain justice and equal opportunity for the Catholic minority in Northern Ireland. Earlier this year the Senate was presented with a Supplemental Extradition Treaty which had been negotiated between the United States and the United Kingdom for ratification by that body. The main purpose of this supplemental treaty is to eliminate a provision in the current treaty between our two nations, excepting political offenders from extradition. The expediency with which this treaty was negotiated and sent to the Senate and the potentially enormous ramifications that removing the political offense exception could have upon our extradition treaties with other nations, has caused deep concern throughout this Congress and the Irish-American community.

I joined many of my fellow colleagues this past fall when I testified before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, against ratification of this treaty. This Nation's extradition policies should be addressed in comprehensive extradition reform legislation, not on a piecemeal basis which could result in unfair or discriminatory immigration practices directed at one community. I am hopeful that the Senate will also remain mindful of the long history of violence and political oppression against the Catholic minority in Northern Ireland throughout any future considerations of this Supplemental Extradition Treaty.

The signing of the Anglo-Irish agreement in November 1986, resulted in a role for the Republic of Ireland in the governance of the North, offering a hopeful first step towards future peace and prosperity in Northern Ireland. In response to this historic accord, the U.S. House of Representatives adopted legislation on March 11, 1986, providing $250 million in aid for economic development and reconciliation only, in Ireland and Northern Ireland. This measure, the Peace, Stability, and Reconciliation in Ireland and Northern Ireland Act of 1986, builds upon, and I believe improves the administration's original proposal, by specifically applying Foreign Assistance Act restrictions relating to police training and by prohibiting use of these moneys for military and paramilitary purposes. I am pleased that the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I am a member, was able to fashion legislation, which fosters reconciliation and achieves the goals of flexibility and accountability.

Before the President can provide moneys into the international fund established pursuant to this legislation, he must certify that the fund's board is broadly representative of a community of interests in Ireland and Northern Ireland, and that fund disbursements meet principles of equality of opportunity and nondiscrimination in employment, without regard to religious affiliation, and address the needs for both communities in Northern Ireland. Each year the President will report to Congress on the degree to which our funds have contributed to the goals of reconciliation, encouraged new investment and development on the basis of equality of opportunity, and increased respect for human rights and fundamental freedom in the North.

The troubles in Northern Ireland will not be resolved by just this first step, but support of constructive efforts to correct the economic and political disenfranchisement of the minority in that region, is a positive beginning.

Let us then give thanks, on St. Patrick's Day 1986, grateful that we as a nation can offer our moral and financial support to our troubled brothers and sisters in Northern Ireland, and that we have been able to help lay the foundation for peace and prosperity in Northern Ireland.

THE SHOCKING DISMISSAL OF LEE IACOCCA

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I have received an excellent letter from Mr. Walter H. Mathis, a friend from Owensboro, KY, who has been actively involved in volunteer work to raise money for the restoration of the Statue of Liberty.

Mr. Mathis highlights his strong disappointment about the firing of Mr. Lee Iacocca from the Government Advisory Commission for the restoration of the Statue of Liberty. Many of my constituents and others across America are upset about the firing of Mr. Iacocca in light of his immense success in fundraising for this very worthwhile cause. Mr. Mathis' letter to me follows:

OWENSBORO, KY,
February 18, 1986.

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD,
Room 2182, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE HUBBARD: This is to convey my shock and disappointment in the firing of Mr. Lee Iacocca from the Government Advisory Commission for the restoration of the Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island. It appears to be an act of partisan politics on the part of the Interior Secretary, Mr. Donald Hodel, unwarranted government intervention into a people project and a let-down to the millions of volunteer workers who responded to Mr. Iacocca's leadership. Those Americans have spent many, many volunteer hours raising funds for the restoration of one of our most prized symbols of freedom.

I am expressing my disappointment, not only as a citizen and volunteer worker but also as a member of the Telephone Pioneers of America, an organization which, nationwide, has raised almost 2 million dollars of it's 3.5 million dollar pledge toward restoration. My wife, Linda, worked hundreds of volunteer hours for 2 years as Statue of Liberty Fund Raising Chairperson for the Kentucky Chapter Telephone Pioneers and the Pennyrile Council Telephone Pioneers; organizations which have raised $25,700 and $3,313 respectively. She and I, like millions of other Americans, are personally committed to the restoration efforts, even without government contributions.

Our federal government can't continue to fund all projects, including all social services, and I have no quarrel with more being shifted downward to be supported by citizens, the private sector and volunteers. However, similiar acts such as Mr. Hodel's firing of Mr. Iacocca are distasteful and without adequate explanation of reason can serve to "turn off" the enthusiasm and commitment of volunteer workers on any worthwhile project.

My conclusions, concerning Mr. Iacocca's dismissal, have been drawn from media information only and any additional explanation available which you feel appropriate to furnish would be appreciated or if you feel that my thoughts should be conveyed to appropriate government officials, including Mr. Hodel, please do.

Yours truly,

WALTER H. MATHIS.

PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL'S 125TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, this year Providence Hospital in Washington, DC, will celebrate its 125th anniversary.

Opened in 1861 by the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, its charter was signed in 1864 by President Lincoln. Since its establishment, the Daughters of Charity and staff of Providence Hospital have given continuous and dedicated care and service to the Washington community. They have tended civilians and soldiers, blind to all but the dignity and worth of each individual who passes through their doors.

In October of last year, Providence Hospital sought permission from the Architect of the Capitol to erect a plaque on the original site of the hospital—Second and D Streets, Southeast—as part of its anniversary celebration. The Architect responded, citing 40 U.S.C. 162, "that no change in the landscape features of the Capitol Grounds (could) be made except on plans to be approved by Congress," and that legislation would be necessary "to permit the erection of the proposed plaque."

Shortly after this, Sr. Catherine Norton, president of Providence, requested that I introduce a bill giving the Daughters of Charity the permission they needed. (By way of background, the request was made of me because my Aunt Margaret is a Daughter of Charity and is known by many of the Sisters in the area.) I am here today to introduce such a bill.

I would like to submit for the RECORD a brief account of the history and features of Providence Hospital.

I would also like to point out that the cost of the preparation of the plaque and pedestal would be borne by the Daughters of Charity at Providence Hospital.

I encourage my colleagues to join me in showing Congress' gratitude to Washington, DC's oldest private, nonprofit hospital in continuous cooperation and to all the individuals who have dedicated themselves to the noble art of healing at this magnificent institution.

H.R. —

A bill to require the Architect of the Capitol to place a plaque at the original site of Providence Hospital

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Providence Hospital Commemorative Plaque Act".

SEC 2. PURPOSE.

The purpose of this Act is to commemorate Providence Hospital for providing 125 years of service to the District of Columbia by authorizing the placement of a plaque at the original site of the Hospital.

SEC. 3. PREPARATION OF PLAQUE.

(a) REQUIRED SPECIFICATIONS.—The Architect of the Capitol shall prepare or accept by donation a plaque that—

(1) is 36 inches in width and 24 inches in height;

(2) displays on the left one-third of the plaque a bas-relief of Providence Hospital as it existed in 1866; and

(3) displays on the right two-thirds of the plaque the following language in Caslon typeface:

"ORIGINAL SITE OF PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL

"Providence Hospital was located on this site during the years 1861 through 1956. Founded in 1861 by the Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul from Emmitsburg, Maryland, the hospital was chartered by an Act of Congress in 1864.

"During the Civil War, while other hospitals in Washington, DC, were filled with war casualties, Providence Hospital had the special mission of providing care primarily to the civilian population. Originally located in a private home, the hospital moved in 1866 to the more permanent quarters illustrated on this plaque.

"On this site, Providence Hospital opened the area's first surgical amphitheater in 1882, inaugurated the first social service department in 1894, and opened the first contagious ward in 1898.

"Providence Hospital moved to its present location at 12th and Varnum Streets, NE, in 1956.".

(b) DISCRETIONARY SPECIFICATIONS.—The Architect of the Capitol shall—

(1) prepare the plaque described in subsection (a) with such additional specifications as the Architect determines to be appropriate for carrying out the purpose of this Act; or

(2) require any such plaque that is donated to comply with such additional specifications.

SEC. 4. MOUNTING OF PLAQUE.

The Architect of the Capitol shall mount any plaque prepared or accepted by donation under section 3 on a pedestal to be built in accordance with section 5.

SEC. 5. CONSTRUCTION OF PEDESTAL.

(a) LOCATION.—The Architect of the Capitol shall construct a pedestal at a location that approximates the location of the main entrance of Providence Hospital as it existed in 1866 or, if the Architect of the Capitol determines that such location is not practicable, at a nearby location on the original site of Providence Hospital.

(b) SPECIFICATIONS.—The pedestal referred to in subsection (a) shall be constructed with such specifications as the Architect of the Capitol determines to be appropriate for carrying out the purpose of this act.

PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL

". . . In the course of a few days a hospital, under the charge and direction of the Sisters of Charity, will be opened for the reception of patients.

The site chosen for the institution is Nicholson Park . . . on Second Street, East, opposite the well-known Carroll Mansion. The house is large and airy, the location high and healthy, and the grounds extensive and beautifully ornamented with shade trees and gravel walks.

We can imagine what a relief it would be to the invalid to be transferred from the hot and dusty city to the grateful shade of this cool and quiet retreat."—Daily National Intelligencer, June 8, 1861, Washington, D.C.

The setting for the opening of Providence Hospital, which admitted its first patient on June 27, 1961, was the capital of a nation torn by civil war. The city's medical facilities, which included 84 other hospitals, were strained by the need to care for the Army's wounded.

The Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul opened Providence to respond to the need for expert and caring medical attention for civilian patients as well as wounded soldiers. In 1864, Congress granted the hospital a charter, which was signed by President Abraham Lincoln.

Of the many hospitals in Washington during the Civil War, only Providence has remained, offering continuous service to patients in the nation's capital.

As even a quick look through these scenes from Washington's past reminds us, there have been many changes in the city during these 125 years.

Providence has changed, too. Working always to provide the best available medical care for its community, Providence has twice outgrown its facilities. After using the Nicholson house for five years, the Sisters began construction of permanent facilities in 1866. Further additions were made in 1869 and 1872.

The formal dedication of the "new" Providence, also located on Capitol Hill, was held on March 15, 1904, with a cast that included James Cardinal Gibbons, Secretary of War William Howard Taft, Speaker of the House Joseph G. Cannon and Surgeon General George M. Sternberg.

Fifty years later, the hospital moved to its present location in northeast Washington, where Archbishop Patrick O'Boyle and Speaker of the House John McCormack helped dedicate the new building on March 25, 1956.

Today Providence is a 364-bed hospital with a 440-member medical staff and more than 500 nurses, offering quality medical care to its community. It provides advanced diagnostic procedures, including a modern radiology department and one of the most sophisticated pathology laboratories in the area. Its nurses continue the caring ministry which has been a hallmark of the Daughters of Charity since the 17th century. Besides its in-patient medical, surgical and obstetric services, Providence offers emergency care for major crises and a Walk-In Health Center for quick medical attention without an appointment in non-emergency situations.

Seton House at Providence was the capital's first hospital-based alcoholism treatment center. It offers both residential and outpatient treatment programs.

The Center for Life is a resource for people struggling with problems affecting the essence and dignity of their lives and the lives of others. Its programs include reduced fee maternity care, family life education and support for homebound elderly patients.

In these and other programs at Providence, the goal remains, as it was 125 years ago, to minister to the needs of the whole person. Providence's pastoral care department offers loving support to patients as they face the stress of illness. Social services professionals help patients take advantage of community resources after they leave the hospital. And everyone on the staff endeavors to provide a caring atmosphere for those who turn to Providence to meet their medical needs.

We hope you will enjoy these views of Washington and Providence as they used to be, that you will help us celebrate the 125 years of service we have been privileged to provide to the Washington area, and that you will help us grow and continue to serve in the future.

Sister CATHERINE NORTON,
President, Providence Hospital.

A STRONG CASE AGAINST SPECIAL TAX BREAKS

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with you excerpts from a speech which Michael D. Rose, chairman and chief executive officer of the Holiday Corp., recently gave to a Laventhol & Horwath development conference in Dallas concerning the state of the hotel industry.

Mr. Rose makes a strong case for comprehensive tax reform, and advocates base-broadening by eliminating special interest tax breaks. He illustrates in a clear way why we should revise the Tax Code so that business decisions are made on the basis of economic rather than tax considerations. Mr. Rose's remarks follow:

There are certain aspects about our business that are very healthy. Demand for our products continues to grow at a slow but steady pace. The demographics of the population are working in our favor. In the very near term, the decline of the dollar over the last few months should help correct the foreign travel imbalance and keep more Americans at home as well as attracting more foreign visitors to the U.S. Rising terrorism also has a dampening impact of U.S. travel abroad.

Falling oil prices should make travel cheaper, and airline deregulation continues to put competitive pressure on prices to the benefit of travelers everywhere.

From the demand side, you would have to sum up our industry with a much overused phrase: we are a mature business. By mature, I mean that on average over any extended period of time, our business will continue to grow in accordance with the overall population growth and overall economic growth.

I don't think we should fret about being in a mature market place, since virtually every product or service ultimately reaches a mature level of demand, with some simply maturing faster than others. If you remember some businesses, like C.B. radios and video game parlors with pizza outlets, the maturity can be awfully fast.

From a demand standpoint, we are in a good solid business that has lots of positives. The problem with the hotel business is not on the demand side. It's on the supply side, and it's been getting worse for a long period of time.

We are in a slow growth, mature industry, and that is often ignored by overestimating demand growth. We all know that feasibility studies get commissioned by people who want to build hotels. No one wants to hear about a 2 percent growth in demand in any given market place because that level of growth will certainly be absorbed by even a minor addition in supply over the near term. So we are constantly overestimating demand growth by being overly optimistic.

We are constantly underestimating supply growth in any given market. While projections of demand look to the future and try to protect many unknowns, projections of supply only look at a point in time. They tend to describe only known products, either currently under construction or in the proposed stage. But they fail to recognize what we all know—in a growing market there can be a whole new set of proposed projects in a very short period of time. By the time your hotel is completed, there can be three other competitors under construction that you never heard of.

The most obvious reason for oversupply is governmental policy which encourages overbuilding. I bet none of you thought about the fact that you are doing business in a government-subsidized industry, but in fact you are. With the change in the federal tax law in 1981, real estate became even more subsidized as an investment form through even more accelerated depreciation as well as investment tax credits.

State and local governments further encourage hotel development by allowing industrial revenue bonds and industrial development bonds at below market rates to be used to subsidize hotel development. And some cities even permit real estate tax reduction for some hotels in some locations.

The lending community has helped move this process along, by making lots of money available during the last five years. While conventional rates are still extremely high in real terms by any historical yardstick, they have come down from those extremely high rates of the late 70s and money has become more readily available as institutions seek places to put their money at work in a slowing economy.

Then there are the syndicators who have found a way to capitalize on all of this. They have been able to find tax motivated investors who don't understand a thing about the basic economics of the hotel business, combine them with a lender eager to place some money at these very high real interest rates, sprinkle in a feasibility study that persuasively convinces everyone that demand in this market place will grow at up to 10% a year and rates will grow at 8% a year. This is proclaimed to be true even though the economy is only growing at 3% and inflation is at 4%, and even though there are 6 other deal-makers out there eyeing the same statistics and putting together their own development package for the very same market sector at this very moment.

Then you toss in a developer who can work with a syndicator to raise the money, work on the construction side to get the hotel built, take a nice development fee for this activity, and get a carried interest in the project with some tax shelter benefits thrown in. And no real risk.

Like every subsidized industry, all the participants take great comfort in the subsidy as equalizing their position through good times and bad. It's only when things get really bad that people begin to realize that the subsidy isn't sufficient. The tax shelter investors who got those famous 2 for 1 write-offs and thought that therefore the other taxpayers had all the risk were right; until foreclosure, and then the depreciation is recaptured and those investors are now looking at a different set of tax economics than they thought they had. The same thing happens to the bond holders of industrial revenue bonds when even the subsidized level of interest can't be serviced.

The first ray of hope is in the passage of a major tax bill in 1986. I would like to see a tax reform bill that puts real estate back on the same footing as other forms of investment, so that real estate decisions can be made with a sharp eye on economic realities instead of most of the focus being on the tax benefits.

I think the shake-out clearly has begun and the marginal competitors are either slowing down, stopping, dropping out or seeking protection under the bankruptcy laws. Shake-outs are painful, lots of people get hurt, but they are cathartic, and they usually do help restore balance.

My personal belief is that the shake-out this time is going to be longer and more painful than the ones that I have experienced in the past. One of the obvious reasons for this is my belief that the oversupply is worse today than it has been in the past.

In any environment the strong will survive and prosper and the weak will ultimately disappear. Subsidies tend to distort this law of nature by first encouraging too many weak competitors and then by prolonging their ultimate demise.

We are in a very attractive industry from a demand standpoint, which has been made unattractive by the intervention of government subsidies in the form of too many tax incentives. These subsidies have attracted too much competition, reducing the returns for everyone, and leading the industry into a shake-out since supply is outstripping demand and has been doing so for the last five years.

The combination of a change in the tax law, and more selective development decisions by both developers and lenders, will probably result in the same pattern we have seen during other periods of supply outstripping demand. The strong will get stronger, the weak will get weaker, and the competitive environment will work to the advantage of the traveling public.

CROP LOAN RATES

HON. DAN BURTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I recently sent a letter to the farmers of my district and gave them incorrect information on crop loan rates which I received directly from the Department of Agriculture. If I, a U.S. Congressman, can't get the right information out of the Department of Agriculture, is it any wonder our farmers are confused?

I called USDA for the loan rates for the 1986 crop year and was incorrectly given the loan rates for the 1985 crop year. Unfortunately, this information was published in a letter I sent to sixth district farmers. The correct loan rates are $2.40 for wheat and $1.92 for corn. The loan rate for soybeans is still to be announced.

I apologize to the farmers in my district for sending them the wrong information. The next time, I'll be more skeptical of any information the USDA gives me. It's no wonder our farmers are frustrated. The new Secretary of Agriculture must make sure this confusion ends immediately.

FARM CREDIT UNCERTAINTY BIG CONCERN TO GROWERS

HON. WEBB FRANKLIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

Mr. FRANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, Mississippi's Second Congressional District, which I represent, is quite similar to rural agricultural areas throughout the country. Most people do not understand the extent to which the entire economy of my district is affected by profits—or lack of profits—on the farm. We are also seriously affected by any delays or inaction from Congress and the USDA. In that regard, 1986 has already been a particularly difficult year.

The following article has appeared in two major southern farm press publications, the Delta Farm Press and the Southwest Farm Press. Many of the causes and effects of our most immediate problems are outlined in this concise summary, and are described by the people most directly affected:

FARM CREDIT UNCERTAINTY BIG CONCERN TO GROWERS

(By Farm Press Editorial Staff)

Although new farm legislation was paramount on agriculture's agenda for many months, that item has finally been stamped into law. Now comes a more immediate concern for farmers and agribusinesses alike—official and final interpretation of some provisions of that law, in particular the freeing of Farmers Home Administration from a quagmire of administrative delays that are binding 1986 production funds so sorely needed by thousands of producers facing spring planting season.

For some reason, rules, and regulations governing FmHA lending policies have not yet come down from Washington and, obviously, many farmers are dependent upon funding by this agency for their very survival.

Too, many farmers with their backs against a financial wall, are seeking leniency from FmHA not only in its demands on delinquent borrowers but in its policies and administration of new production loans.

CAMPAIGN MOUNTED

So acute has the situation become that many banks, agribusinesses, farm organizations and individual farmers recently initiated an effort to obtain the attention of Vice President George Bush during his recent visit to Mississippi.

They feel that administration action can and must be taken immediately:

". . . The existing policies on eligibility requirements for FmHA loans have almost stifled a large number of the applications filed at local FmHA offices in our area," said Chip Morgan, executive vice president of Mississippi's Delta Council, in a letter to Bush.

". . . Planting the 1986 crop is at hand. Unfortunately, many farmers do not know if they will be able to secure financing due to their current loan status and to the present policies of the FmHA," said CPA Eugene Clarke, Hollandale, Miss. ". . . We encourage you to . . . adopt a policy of leniency for our farmers during this time of depressed farm prices," he told the vice president.

PLEA FROM BANKERS

". . . Please use your influence to help bring to the attention of our leaders in Washington the need for FmHA to come forth with some practical and feasible program of survival to fit this period of hard times."—John W. Pope, President, Bank of Hollandale, Miss.

". . . It is imperative that the FmHA implement debt deferrals and reamortization programs in order for the farmer to survive."—Burell O. McGee, President and Chairman, Bank of Leland, Miss.

". . . I ask that you support and work for the reinstatement of the moratorium on FmHA foreclosures until agricultural economic conditions improve."—George Green, President, Valley Bank, Cleveland, Miss.

From H.E. McCaslin, Chairman, First National Bank of Rosedale, Miss.: ". . . Farmers need help from FmHA now, not foreclosures."

"Time is of the essence for farmers of America," wrote Howard W. Hemphill, President of Dixie Ag Credit, Inc., Belzoni, Miss. "Planting time is almost here; however, the farm program policy has not been implemented at the local level of FmHA and Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service. Please assist in expediting this program. . . ."

And, from agribusiness:

". . . It doesn't appear to me that the administration has the total picture. This financial situation has to be dealt with now. It is a desperate situation from every angle. . . ."—Jimmy Sanders, President, Sanders Seed Co., Cleveland, Miss.

". . . Please have FmHA policy passed down from Washington so that 1986 loan applications can be processed. No applications are being taken from delinquent borrowers pending policy from Washington."—Solon Scott, President, Scott Petroleum Corp., Itta Bena, Miss.

". . . There appears to be mass confusion at the present time." said Jere B. Nash, Jr., Chairman of the Board and CEO of Delta Implement Co., Leland, Miss., in his letter to the vice president. "We desperately need details of the program to be worked out so that the status of the farmer can be clarified with FmHA and/or ASCS and loans expedited to those farmers who are to receive them."

". . . Farmers need immediate help in the form of direct loans and debt deferral . . . The recent FmHA policy seems to be too strict. . . ."—D.O. Baker, President, Baker Implement Co., Leland, Miss.

". . . Particularly urgently needed is the information regarding FmHA policy on farmers whose previous loans are delinquent. . . . Without prompt action and assistance, the whole economy of our Mississippi Delta will be in very serious condition."—V.L. Ayres, President, The Ayres Co., Leland, Miss.

And a Case III dealer writes:

"The farmer, his landlord, his suppliers are all in a quandary as to what to do. As planting time gets near, it is becoming increasingly critical. If the farmer is not going to be able to farm the land, the landlord needs to rent it to someone else and his creditors need to take whatever steps they can to protect themselves. . . ."—Jack Johnson, Johnson Implement Co., Greenwood, Miss.

". . . We need help from Washington immediately in the form of implementing the new farm program. Lending institutions and businesses cannot make a decision at this time. Everything is at a complete standstill pending action on this matter."—Raymond Murrell, Delta Seed & Services, Arcola, Miss.

". . . Action needs to be taken in Washington so the farmer will not continue to be left in a holding pattern and not know where he's going in the 1986 farming year. Please expedite the necessary actions on the '86 farm bill so that the necessary monies can be released and farmers can move forward."—William M. McCrory, McCrory Agricultural Sales, Greenville, Miss.

Bill Lowry, Jr., President of Lowry Storage Systems, Inc., Greenville, Miss., told Vice President Bush that "I have heard farmers will love the new farm bill in 1990. . . . This is a joke as the majority of them won't be farming in 1990. The Ark. La. Miss. farmers are in desperate need of answers and decisions from the Department of Agriculture. . . ."

From the Mississippi Farm Bureau Federation: ". . . Many producers have suffered through several years of losses to the extent that all equity is now gone and they are at the end of the rope for the year 1986. Changes in regulations will dictate that many will no longer be able to qualify for funds from the 'last resort' lending institution—FmHA . . . My appeal to you is that every effort be made that could give relief to a group of people whose future plans have been clouded by misfortune . . ."—Hugh M. Arant, President.

". . . Cannot your high office be used to help alleviate this Farmers Home Administration problem to the extent that these borrowers, who have a chance of surviving, will be given that opportunity? . . ."—Alex S. Curtis, President and CEO, Farmers Grain Terminal, Greenville, Miss.

". . . The Farmers Home Administration is holding up programs that are in place to finance farmers this year. The situation is so desperate in many instances, that farmers cannot purchase tractor fuel, pay for labor, or any other farm expenses. . . ."—Thomas C. Parry, President, Mississippi Chemical Corporation.

From other lenders:

". . . As we meet with our farmers to try to set up 1986 financing, we run into some problems due to the new farm program. As a lender, these factors become more critical as we deal with those borrowers of ours whose financial situations have deteriorated significantly and whose ability to obtain financing is questionable. . . . Your encouraging those responsible for making prompt decisions on the definite provisions of the farm program would be most helpful and appreciated."—Curtis A. Buchanan, Regional Vice President, First South Production Credit Association.

And letters from individual farmers to Vice President Bush: ". . . We need some help immediately. We need for George Bush and Ronald Reagan to cut the red tape and act NOW—we don't need words, we need action. Farmers are desperate."—Anson H. Sheldon, Jr., 1,200 acre farmer, Greenville, Miss.

". . . Due to bad weather, high interest rates, high costs of labor, high fuel costs, and the low price of farm products and the embargo, farmers had no chance to control their destiny. Most FmHA borrowers at one time were sound farmers and could have paid off their obligations had the situations not gotten out of control. . . . Without the moratorium put back in place, the farm situation may cause economic depression worse than the one in the "30s."—W.T. Tullos, Tullos Farms, Beulah, Miss.

". . . The FmHA rules and regulations at the present time have such requirements that no one can meet them and get production money. . . ."—Joe Lee Gilbert, Cleveland, Miss.

". . . Two major areas of concern are the FmHA loans and credit regulations and the ASCS regulations and guidelines for crop limitations. Both of these farm programs need to be studied and revised to provide relief and support for the farmer. . . ."—Jim Humber, III. Clarksdale, Miss.

". . . Although our needs are many, there are two things that must be done quickly if we are to continue in business: (1) FmHA must change its loan and payback policy so that many of our farmers can get production loans for this year's crop. And, I must add they need that money now. (2) USDA must come forth with a speedy interpretation of the new farm bill so that our county ASCS offices can administer the new farm program fairly and efficiently."—Noel Morgan, cotton, rice and soybean farmer, Cleveland, Miss.

". . . I urge you to help the farmer and reinstate the moratorium on foreclosures in our state and look into the FmHA situation with an open mind."—John Gates, Cleveland, Miss.

And this from a farm wife:

". . . Farmers need your support today! As a Mississippi farm wife, I have seen the fall of our family farm system and turn to you, our vice president, for help. I am requesting you help reinstate the moratorium in Mississippi and recognize our federal farm program and regulations so farming can become feasible again."—Ms. Gerri Gates, Cleveland, Miss.

All told, over 300 letters from this state alone have been forwarded to Vice President Bush.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 534, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, 1986

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 398 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

H. RES. 398

Resolved, That all points of order for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXVIII are hereby waived against the consideration of the conference report and amendment reported from conference in disagreement on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 534) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes. All points of order for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived against a motion to concur in the Senate amendment reported from conference in disagreement with the amendment printed in the joint statement of managers on said conference report.

□ 1125

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAVROULES). The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. QUILLEN], for purposes of debate only, and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this rule permits consideration of the conference report on House Joint Resolution 534, the joint resolution making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the current fiscal year.

The rule waives clause 2 of rule XXVIII against consideration of the conference report and the amendment reported in disagreement. This is the rule which requires that conference reports be printed in the RECORD and lay over for 3 days after the reports and accompanying statements have been filed in the House. This waiver is necessary since the conference report on House Joint Resolution 534 was filed on March 12.

It also should be noted that the rule waives clause 7 of rule XVI against a motion to concur in the Senate amendment reported from conference in disagreement with the amendment printed in the joint statement of the managers. This is the rule prohibiting nongermane amendments. This waiver is required because the provisions relating to the operating credit program of the Farmers Home Administration are not germane to the provisions relating to the urgent supplemental for the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is of great importance to our farmers across the country. The Commodity Credit Corporation is running out of money for the government's farm price support programs. The CCC borrows funds from the Treasury to distribute to farmers in the form of crop loans, income subsidies, and other farm price supports. The CCC plans to distribute more money than usual during the current fiscal year by giving partial income subsidies to farmers in advance of the planting season. This signup program under the farm bill of 1985 is being held up. If the CCC lacks funds to make the deficiency payments in advance, many farmers will not be able to put in their spring crops and the farm program will come to a standstill. The emergency appropriation of $5 billion in this bill should help to carry the CCC programs into the summer.

The joint resolution also makes certain that the $2.7 billion provided in the continuing appropriation resolution for fiscal 1986 for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration will in fact remain available. The funds will be available at the $2.7 billion level until expended, except that this level may be reduced by the sequester order of March 1, 1986.

Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any opposition to this rule on the conference report, and I urge my colleagues to adopt it.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the rule has been ably explained, and it would be redundant for me to go into detail on the rule again.

We all know there is a crisis in our farm areas. We know it is spring planting time. We know that this measure needs to be considered on the floor of the House.

I urge the adoption of the rule, even though there are waivers granted.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this rule. This rule is an embarrassment to this House, it is an embarrassment to the Congress, and it is certainly an embarrassment at a time when we are trying to do something about controlling our budgetary problems.

What this rule does is make in order the consideration of a conference report that contains a nongermane amendment that will add to the budget outlays of this Nation in 1986 $900 million. You are talking here about a $900 million rule. This rule is an embarrassment. We ought not be considering it out here. There is no way that the bill that is being brought to the floor under this rule should be brought to this House.

The amendment that we are talking about is an amendment that was not passed by this House nor was it passed by the other body. It was added in the conference committee. It is the big spenders' typical ploy whenever they want to spend big money. What they do is, they take a totally legitimate bill—and let us understand that the CCC bill is a very legitimate bill. There is a need out in the country because we purposely underfunded the CCC program at the beginning of the year. We now need to come back and fund it at the full levels, otherwise farmers are in big trouble. We need to do that. So you have got a much needed bill. And what do they do? They go to the conference committee and they add in $900 million of additional outlays so that we can justify it based upon the fact we have got this bill we have got to pass. So we are going to throw $900 million more into the deficit of this country in order to spend that additonal money on a bill which is needed but which never should be brought to the floor under these circumstances.

I tell you it is an embarrassment for this House of Representatives to have a situation where the Appropriations Committee is walking into conference committees and coming up with this kind of a proposal, this add on, that was not passed by either House and was done strictly in conference committee. And then to have a rule brought to the floor that justifies that kind of behavior I just think is wrong, and we ought not justify it.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, may I say that the only reason we have this provision in here at all is because somebody made a misinterpretation.

In December we passed a continuing resolution. In that resolution there was $2.7 billion for direct operating loans. Folks began to argue because subsequently the legislative committee used a smaller figure. The money is already available. It is not made available here. Your attention is called to the fact that it has been available all the time.

So the gentleman is completely incorrect. We do not make the money available here. We call attention to the fact that we made it available in December. And you cannot change an appropriation by passing an authorization bill later.

So the gentleman is in error, and I just wanted to call his attention to it.

Mr. WALKER. I appreciate the chairman's explanation, but I do have in front of me here a statement of administration policy that backs up precisely what I just said. The administration policy says it adds $919 million in new direct lending authority for the Farmers Home Administration and it increases 1986 outlays by almost $900 million over previous projects.

That is the administration saying that, and I would say to the gentleman that if he wants to call the administration wrong—virtually everybody is always wrong out here, but the problem is that we end up spending the money. And what I am saying to you is that you could not do this, you could not put this money in there if you did not have this rule coming before us that allows you to put the money in.

I would say to the gentleman that we ought not have a situation out here where you are using the Rules Committee in order to justify an amendment that was put in without either House having approved that amendment.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTEN. This morning I called the young man who wrote this letter and called his attention to this. Has the gentleman talked to him lately? He might do that, because it is agreed that the statement in the letter is incorrect.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the chairman, but I have no reason to understand whatsoever that this statement of administration policy that has been brought to the floor is in fact not the administration policy and that they are not going to strongly oppose this legislation—not because of the CCC provisions, which this gentleman states are needed, but because the Appropriations Committee on its own has decided that we are now going to spend $900 million more.

The gentleman refers to the fact that money was already in the pipeline from previous appropriations. Well, I will say to the gentleman that we passed the farm bill, though, afterwards, so what you are really saying is that if you take the line of reasoning that the chairman is giving us on the floor, we are going to repudiate the farm bill. I suggest we ought not be repudiating the farm bill.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH].

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to the Rules Committee for recognizing the desperate seriousness of the agricultural situation and allowing this bill to come to the floor today.

I come from the second most agricultural district in the Nation. My people are out there waiting for these advance deficiency payments. Most of them expect to use that money to enable them to pay for this year's crop. It is planting time now, so time is of the essence, and I am thankful that we have this bill on the floor today.

Now, let me point out that, contrary to what my colleague has just said, the 1986 appropriations bill provided $2.7 billion for direct loans through FHA. This bill was passed by the House, passed by the Senate, signed by the President in December.

We are only giving the administration the authority to use the amount that was already appropriated to alleviate the forth-coming credit crunch.

And let me add that last year it was necessary to spend well over $4 billion to alleviate the most desperate credit situation in agriculture through the Farmers Home Administration loan program, and if we pass this bill we will only have made available $3.4 billion total and will probably have to come later for more funds.

I urge that you approve the rule and that we go forward and let this $5 billion be available to relieve a desperate situation in our agricultural areas.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to recognize that, based upon what the gentlewoman has just told us, the administration, as of yesterday, indicated that they are going to use their emergency authority to transfer $750 million from other programs within FHA to make the direct operating loan program workable. So the fact is that when we add this $900 million, what we are going to do is, instead of just $900 million, because of that transfer you are going to have $1.6 billion available in those accounts.

This gentleman suggests that at a time of deficits, when farmers are suffering as a result of high interest rates and all of the other things that we have as deficits, to add this to a program that this gentleman admits is necessary—the gentlewoman is absolutely right, the CCC program is absolutely necessary. But to go along with this travesty that adds in $900 million to a basic bill it seems to me is just not in our interest, particularly when the administration is trying to act responsibly.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentlewoman from Nebraska.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I was at the White House 3 days ago and asked the President to transfer that money, as he did last year, because we were out of money in FHA. Without any FmHA money in my State, how are my farmers expected to continue their operations?

Mr. WALKER. And the President has done that. That is precisely what the President has done.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH].

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, let me emphasize that that $750 million will not last very long. It will take about $4 billion for this year's program. That $750 million, coupled with what is in this bill, $2.7 billion, will leave us with a total of only $3.4 billion, considerably less than the $4 billion we used last year for FmHA.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs SMITH of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. The reason why you do not have enough money in the program is because it was deliberately underfunded, in the first place.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. And that is the problem that we now face.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. I will reclaim my time.

I do not agree with this. We cannot tell in the Appropriations Committee what the weather is going to be or how much money we are going to need for a total year of CCC appropriations. We do not want to overfund these programs that fluctuate so much.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 283, nays 129, not voting 22, as follows:

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the rule just adopted, I call up the conference report on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 534) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report.

AMENDMENT IN DISAGREEMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment: Page 2, line 10, strike out all after "prices" down to and including "Acts" in line 16.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. WHITTEN

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WHITTEN moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: Restore the matter stricken by said amendment, amended to read as follows: ": Provided further, That after fiscal year 1987, funds available to the Corporation may be used to carry out section 1241(a)(1) of the Food Security Act of 1985, only to such extent or in such amounts as provided in advance in appropriations Acts. The sign-up agreement should not reduce total production below levels needed to meet domestic needs, maintain the supply line, and provide for an adequate supply for export by either the Commodity Credit Corporation or private corporations or individuals at competitive prices; since by law the proceeds from sales become available for use by the Commodity Credit Corporation, such sales should reduce future appropriations: Provided further, That the conservation reserve program shall not replace or reduce any existing conservation program.

"The level of funds previously appropriated for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration, as provided in the Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1986 for Agriculture, Rural Development, and Related Agencies (H.R. 3037), as enacted by Public Law 99-190 on December 19, 1985, shall be available until expended except as that level may be reduced by the terms of the sequester order implemented on March 1, 1986.".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I may have the attention of my colleagues. As you doubtless know on December 4, 1985, with all the problems facing American agriculture and thereby the country, the House of Representatives passed a bill which I had introduced which provided that we should announce a loan program for basic commodities that lets the farmer make a profit and make the purchasers pay the cost. I still think that is what we should do and the law permits it now. However that measure failed in the other body.

The bill that was enacted into law by the Congress provides for paying cash to take certain amounts of acreage out of production and to make certain deficiency payments and to fix certain rates of pay.

Now, 1,336,000 American farmers today are waiting for those deficiency payments. Not only that, but it is extremely difficult for most people in agriculture to get loans to make their crops this year.

Under the law that we passed that leaves us where many, many of them are absolutely dependent on borrowing from the Farmers Home Administration, the Government agency.

If we do not act today, on Thursday, and it has to go over until Monday, notices will go out to all the county offices all over the country to close shop, so we are told.

So we met with the Senate, and let me point out that every conferee, Democrat and Republican on the House and the Senate side, signed this conference report.

Now, our friend makes a point here, and I called the young man who writes the House Republican Council Legislative Digest. I called him this morning and called his attention to the errors that are in there.

The only reason that the reference to $2.7 billion is mentioned in here is to point out they already had it but have not used it. It was made available in the continuing resolution which we passed in December, but someone in the executive branch interpreted that to mean that an appropriation already in the law and already available was changed by a later authorization for a lesser amount.

□ 1205

That is not true. We put the provision in here to call attention to the fact that it is not true. If Members just think a minute, they know that money already appropriated and in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the obligations of the Department does not get changed because some other committee later may lower an authorization. So we put it in here to call attention to that fact. There is no argument about it.

I repeat again: I can tell you why I think the present farm law is not good. I could tell you why it is sound to tell them to still go ahead and arrange a program where the farmer gets something connected with the cost of production, and not only that, but lets the fellow who buys his product pay him for it instead of paying for it out of the Treasury.

But that is not what was decided. I voted for the new farm bill because it is the best that had a chance. So I respectfully urge Members to pass this as quickly as we can.

I do not want to be responsible for these messages going out to close shop.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this bill and I want to commend our chairman for all the hard work that he has done on it.

I also want to commend the Committee on Rules for its understanding of the desperately serious plight that agriculture faces by making it possible so that we can bring this issue up today and not have to wait until next week and have the further distress across the agricultural economy of having notices sent out to our distressed farmers telling them that we do not have any money to pay the advance deficiency payments that we have previously agreed to pay.

I know that we have many, many farmers out across Nebraska who are waiting for these payments so that they will have enough money to plant their crops and planting time is right upon us. So it is very, very important that we act now.

Also, another important part of this supplemental provides that we will have the authority to use the full $2.7 billion that we have already appropriated through the appropriations process, approved by this House, approved by the Senate, signed by the President last December, that we will have it available to use through this year.

Let me point out that this is a substantially lesser amount than we had to spend last year to meet the most desperate credit needs of the agricultural economy.

I also want to commend the President for realizing this plight of agriculture, because when I went to him about this problem earlier this week he set aside $750 million of emergency funding to give us some funding immediately, because in my State and in many other States we are clear out of money. I want to point out that at the rate we are lending money right now in Nebraska, if appropriated equally to all States, our share of the money he set aside will last approximately 7 days, 1 week, and we are not yet at the peak of our lending needs.

So this is a very, very important bill and I urge that Members support it.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to our distinguished ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE].

Mr. CONTE. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, there's a lot of rhetoric in this Chamber this morning about the urgent need to help the American farmer and how this urgent supplemental is designed to provide that help. I don't know who we're trying to fool here, but I hope that the farmer has his ears and eyes open on this one.

This is no longer just an urgent CCC supplemental, which I supported, for $5 billion. We took a step into the twilight zone on February 26, when we passed this joint resolution that contained unrelated language on the new conservation reserve and the crop insurance programs. Today, we bring you a conference agreement which, after 15 long hard days, settles the issue of funding for the time being on the CCC, and reaffirms our commitment to the new reserve and the crop insurance programs as well as to our existing conservation programs. But it also contains an extra billion dollars in new loan authority for a Farmers Home Administration program.

Members should know this. Farmers should know this. The reason that the CCC has been shut down for over a week, and the reason that farmers cannot get their entitled payments, is because we are tinkering around with laws that have only been on the books for 3 months now—the farm bill, the CR, and Gramm-Rudman.

If we were truly serious about helping the American farmer, we would give the CCC the full amount of funding that it needs to meet our Federal commitments under existing law. That is at least another $2.3 billion more than we have in this bill. Then we should work like the dickens, day and night for as long as it takes, to repeal and then amend that 1985 farm bill, the most expensive mistake we have made in this 99th Congress.

But here, we are holding up money that is rightfully due the American farmer to deal with unrelated and less urgent issues. I don't know whose interest is served by inviting a Presidential veto, and that is what we have done with the conference report before us today.

As a member of the conference committee, I am generally pleased with the agreements which we have reached on this urgent supplemental. We have made some commendable changes to the House version which will allow us to get a running head start on the retirement of highly erodible cropland through the Conservation Reserve Program without reducing our commitment to existing conservation activities.

Mr. Speaker, I urge defeat to this motion for the simple reason that we will be inviting a veto, and subjecting the people we are trying to help to further, needless delays in receiving the money they are owed under existing law. As the gentleman is well aware, the amendment included in the conference agreement is expected to add $900 million in new outlays to our fiscal year 1986 totals. At a time when we are so desperate to reduce our deficits that we pass a law requiring automatic, across-the-board cuts, this is no time to be adding to the deficit.

I will admit that there is a considerable dispute over the levels which the Congress approved for the operating loan program of Farmers Home in fiscal year 1986. If we are to reconcile these differences we should do so in a separate and distinct manner, as the gentleman has proposed in one of the other recent resolutions which he has introduced, H.R. 4363. Let us remind ourselves that the CCC has been shut down because of our actions or inactions for the past week.

This gentleman well remembers the hectic last days of the first session in which we considered and passed the 1985 farm bill. That measure placed a ceiling of $1.74 billion on insured operating loans. One day after, we passed the fiscal year 1986 CR which contained $2.7 billion for the same program. The President happened to sign the farm bill after the CR, and his administration considers the lower levels to be binding. That is where the difference of the $1 billion comes in. This is a considerable amount. If this deserves the attention and reconciliation of our colleagues, then we should give it full attention in a separate measure. But for the past 3 months, those levels have been binding. The sequester which took effect on March 1 was based on a level of $1.7 billion. In taking action to change fiscal year 1986 levels at this time, without full details on the new outlay impacts, we are once again giving an exemption to an individual farm program and increasing the level of the cuts which may have to be taken in fiscal year 1987 if another more massive sequester must be made.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts and I, have worked together for a long time. I do not believe he heard the earlier statement.

I have before me the legislative digest of the Republican conference, which has the information which the gentleman gave Members. I called attention earlier to the fact that we do not have the money in here. It was in the continuing resolution which was signed into law last December.

What we had to do here was to point out that it was available because somebody down town was interpreting the law as being that where we had an appropriation and money was made available, and it is already available to the Department of Agriculture, that at some later date if the legislative committee comes along after the fact, with a lesser amount, the appropriation was repealed. They were interpreting that subsequent law as having changed the appropriation bill which had been passed and was signed by the President.

So there is no extra $1 billion in here. We tried to point out in here, and this is the second time today I have pointed it out, that we do not put the money in here; we call attention to the fact that we provided the money last December. I would like the record to show that and correct this again. This letter is completely misleading. If you call the young man who wrote it, he will agree with that.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to yield 1 minute to my good friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this additional time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I am only trying to inform the House of the facts of life. If this bill should ever get through, it is going to be vetoed because of this FmHA provision. It ought to be put in a separate bill. That is all I am saying.

If this goes back to the other body, I am willing to make a wager of a catfish to a lobster to the chairman of the committee that this report will not even get through the other body.

□ 1215

Senator DOMENICI is not going to let this bill get through the Senate with this budget-busting $1 billion provision.

Will you take me up on that, a box of catfish for lobsters?

Mr. WHITTEN. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to point out that all Senate conferees signed the conference report. House rules prevent me from commending them by name.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Members should avoid reference to Members of the other body.

Mr. WHITTEN. It is not often that you get all of the Senators to agree with you. I did that in this case.

On the other point my colleague mentioned here, I will read on page 4 where it says—

> The conferees insist that the funds provided in the Appropriations Act remain available for fiscal year 1986, and remain available until expended, except as that level may be reduced by the terms of the sequester order implemented on March 1, 1986.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] has expired.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

I do not know what we could do to protect the gentleman any more than that.

Mr. CONTE. Would the gentleman agree with me on another point, though? I stick by what I said. I believe that this bill will not get through the other body.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE].

Mr. CONTE. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

I say the bill will not get through the other body, and if it gets through, it will not get by the administration. They are going to veto it, and you are holding up the CCC payments that are so badly needed.

But is it not true, Mr. Chairman, under the sequester order and the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings provisions that only $74 million was sequestered from the Farmers Home Administration?

Mr. WHITTEN. We made it subject to the sequester order in this resolution. He is my President, too, I would hate for him to veto this matter based on misleading information. That is the reason I called the facts to the attention of the young man who wrote this Republican letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] has expired.

Mr. CONTE. That was a short 2 minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Let me say softly what I said rather loudly a few minutes ago. This bill is literally an embarrassment.

We had a bill that went through this House that was basically agreed to by everybody that we ought to give $5 billion to CCC, that it is needed because the programs were underfunded to begin with. They have run out of money and the farmers out there need it. It went through this House. A similar bill went through the other body. Those two bills got to conference committee, and the Appropriations Committee, in its wisdom, decided to take a rules-breaking action of adding a nongermane amendment that adds $900 million in outlays.

I would say to the distinguished chairman, I do not think anybody is arguing about whether or not that young man, whoever it is, up in the legislative digest shop of the Republican conference said it. The point is that the Executive Office of the President, the Office of Management and Budget says the same thing. The point is that the statement of administration policy says the same thing. I think that they probably have some credibility in looking at the figures. They are saying that this bill is $900 million off. It does not much matter what some young man in the legislative digest shop says. The administration is saying that this is, in fact, a $900-million budget-buster, and that is the problem that this gentleman has, and I think a number of Members in this body would have.

We are talking here about a process that is going to end up with this body spending $900 million more of deficit, and that is what we are doing here. We ought not kid oursleves, and we ought not try to slough it off anyplace else. We are responsible with the action that we are taking today with adding $900 million to the budget deficit of this country. That is the whole point.

As of yesterday, the President tried to solve some of this problem by adding $750 million in new operating loan funds for the Farmers Home Administration. He tried to take care of the emergency nature of the problem. We have heard referred today that, well, that is simply not enough money. I quote from the press release that the Secretary of Agriculture has sent out with regard to it. This is from the Secretary of Agriculture and he says:

These funds will come from accounts where demand is considerably less than anticipated and should assure satisfactory levels of operating loans for all eligible farm borrowers.

In other words, the Department does not agree that this is not enough money, that they have now provided enough money, and what we are doing is adding $900 million more over and above what is needed. We are busting the budget here with what we are doing. Pure and simple, this is $900 million in budget-busting. The administration says so, OMB says so. We cannot get around it.

Mr. WHITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. In just a minute, but let me make one final point here. We have done this consistently.

The Appropriations Committee, I think, has to take some responsibility for the fact that if you go back and look at what we committed ourselves to do in budgets over the last 5 years, and what we ended up doing in spending, we have overspent our own budget resolutions in actual spending by $160 billion in the last 5 years, and $45 billion of that comes in what area? In agriculture. In agriculture, $45 billion of that $160 billion comes from.

In other words, when it comes to actual spending, we exceed our first budget resolutions consistently.

I have to tell you, that is where deficits come from. They are not some magical thing that appears. They are not the President down there spending money that he has not got. It is us. We are spending the money. We are giving him the money to spend, and that is where it comes from.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the reason I quoted this letter, all of you are using $900 million. The difference between the two figures is $1 billion, $1.7 billion and $2.7 billion, and I mentioned the letter because that is bound to be where the $900 million comes from. I repeat again, that is not true.

Let me say something else you do not seem to be aware of. The President's budget asked for $7.9 billion. They said on the telephone they really needed $8.8 billion. So we are below the ceiling imposed by the Budget Act. We are below the amount that they asked for downtown. Not a dime of it will be spent unless it is needed. We have 1,336,000 folks waiting for advance deficiency payments that are due under the law that the Congress has passed.

Mr. WALKER. If I can reclaim my time, since I have limited time and the gentleman can, of course, yield himself whatever time he wants.

Mr. WHITTEN. I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania 2 additional minutes.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for the time and I am happy to continue to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTEN. So these folks are entitled to their money. This resolution makes the money available. Unless we approve this resolution, a whole lot of applicants are going to be turned down.

We had the head of the Farmers Home Administration before us, and he took the view that under the new farm bill, he doubted many folks could show that they would make enough money to pay their debts.

But I say again, we only make it available. It is not used unless your administration approves the application, and it is not made available here in this resolution. It was made available in December, and because a legislation committee subsequently comes along with a different figure does not change the fact.

Mr. WALKER. And then we will have people running around the country politically saying that we made the money available but the administration refused to spend it and so, therefore, this administration is insensitive to agriculture.

Mr. WHITTEN. I have not stated that.

Mr. WALKER. We ought to have the guts, we ought to have the guts right here and now to decide what the priorities of this country are, and we ought not add $900 million of additional spending authority.

I have to say to the chairman, too, that he has raised the issue of the farm bill here. You know when some of us voted for the farm bill, we voted for the good and the bad. One of the angles of the farm bill was in addition to spending the money, it also saved some money. One of the areas in which it saved some money was right here. What we are now doing on the floor with this bill is we are saying, well, those savings may have taken place, but forget it, the Appropriations Committee overrides the authorization committee and so, therefore, we are going to go ahead and spend the money regardless with what the farm bill said.

I will say to the gentleman when I voted for the farm bill, I voted for some of the savings as well as some of the spending. I resent the fact that we now come back and override that spending decision.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

□ 1225

Mr. CONTE. Another point I made, which was glossed over was that, under the sequester, under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings vote, $74 million was sequestered from the Farmers Home Administration Insured Operating Loan Program.

Now you are turning around, because they have already had a sequester, and you are putting in another $900 million. How about all the other programs? The distinguished chairman of our Subcommittee on Labor-HHS-Education, Bill NATCHER, and I are sitting up there listening to all the testimony from the National Institutes of Health; they got lopped 4.3 percent on research for cancer, heart, lung, diabetes, digestive disease, you name them; education got lopped 4.3 percent; 100,000 students fell off the roles of Pell grants. Let's bring in $1 billion for that.

Mr. WALKER. Federal retirees did not get their COLA's.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, here we are again. It seems like every month we can get a record out. We only change the time; faces do not change and facts do not change, but the Appropriations Committee finds itself in a posture here of trying to help some people who are destitute today; the farmers of America, or a great majority of them.

We find ourselves caught in a dilemma here. It is criticized if we do and criticized if we do not. Twice in December this committee was criticized for not appropriating enough money to take care of the farmers. Twice we were criticized when we came to the floor.

We were forced into that position because we could not appropriate enough. Now we are hoping that we are appropriating or at least identifying enough money from previous appropriations that will take care of the agricultural needs very soon, in the next 60 days and most of rural America.

We are caught again on that thing that we have run into too many times of OMB using one set of rules as a guideline; what they count and what they do not count. Our own offices here using a different one.

Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is right to a point; I would agree with him. But if he is absolutely right then we have nothing to fear whatsoever; the money will never be spent. Because we are only doing here something that has already been done.

So if the gentleman is right that the money that the President set aside earlier this week to take care of agricultural needs, if that is sufficient, then the money we are identifying in this bill will never be spent for any purpose.

So we have nothing to fear then; it will be taken care of.

The real problem is on scoring. Here is where the Office of Management and Budget has a statement of administrative policy, and they state, "adds $919 million in new direct lending authority for the Farmers Home Administration." Then the second, as if it were added to that, increases 1986 outlays by almost $900 million.

Well, they are both the same, but it does not do that, as the chairman has previously said. The question is, the language that we put in yesterday in the conference report, I want to read it to you. After reading it, you tell me where it appropriates the money.

This is the section of the conference report that is in question, and I quote:

> The level of funds previously appropriated for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration, as provided in the Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1986 for Agriculture, Rural Development, and Related Agencies (H.R. 3037), as enacted by Public Law 99-190 on December 19, 1985, shall be available until expended except as that level may be reduced by the terms of the sequester order implemented on March 1, 1986.

On December 19, that provision passed this House by a vote of 261 to 137. No new appropriated money than this; we simply identify that money that already is appropriated; shall remain available if it is needed, if it is needed.

Again I reiterate, subject to the reduced terms of the sequester order. It does not do anything about Gramm-Rudman. It recognizes the deductions by Gramm-Rudman.

So my friends, the poor farmer out there who is struggling right now, trying to find some way to get enough money to plant the crop that we are all going to enjoy eating in the fall, hopefully we will export a lot of it and help the balance of trade, he is wondering where that money will come from.

He may have to look to this source here, so you have to decide today when you cast this vote for or against this conference report, no one can make that decision except you. Are we more concerned about the ground rules here and within the Congress that "Oh, we've stepped on someone's toes"—which we have not—but if we are more concerned about that than we are about rural America, about the farmers that are so vitally needed and are in such destitute condition today, are we going to help that farmer or are we going to worry about our ground rules?

Yes, I agree with the gentleman, our dear friend from Massachusetts, I think farmers are watching today; but they may be looking a little bit different than the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks. They may be looking to say, "Is that Congress really concerned about rural America, the farmers' need to get the crops planted, or are they more concerend about their ground rules; whether we appropriate it this way or a different way?"

I think farmers, yes, are too sophisiticated, too intelligent; will see through this game today.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE].

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I just want to add to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS], I have supported the CCC, and I believe we should have $2.3 billion more for the farmers in this bill today, but I am not going to support any more of these shenanigans.

The gentleman from Indiana has indicated that sequester applies to this FmHA increase. If the full 4.3 percent sequester had applied when the sequester took effect on March 1 at $2.7 billion, we would have sequestered $116 million and not $74 million.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to my good friend, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FRANKLIN].

Mr. FRANKLIN. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding, and first of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the dean of this House, my colleague from Mississippi, Chairman WHITTEN. In my home State he is known as the Permanent Secretary of Agriculture. He has been dealing with these kinds of problems for a long time. He understands them, and I appreciate the input that he has had into this agricultural policy of this Nation.

The practical effect, my friends, of what we are doing here today is to alleviate a problem that farmers all over this Nation have. When they go into the Farmers Home Administration office, they sign up and they are put on a list as to the date they get in there.

Their loans are processed and many of them approved. If the money is available, then those farmers get funded. However, if that money is not available, then they are told by their local supervisors: "I'm sorry, you're going to have to wait until we get an additional appropriation out of the U.S. Congress."

This happened three times last year, and the longer we waited the more and more we were assuring those farmers who were approved and not funded that they were going to have a crop disaster for this planning year.

I think that this is an attempt to try to make the kind of money available that is needed so that those farmers who get approved through the regulations and the rules that are stringent, very stringent.

Once they get approved, that money should be there for them so that they can get their checks and begin their farming operation so that they can continue to be viable as producers and people who have a chance to make a profit. That is what the agency is for; that is what we are doing here today.

My friend from Pennsylvania says that we ought to have the guts here today to determine the spending priorities. Well, I think that is exactly what we are doing. I think that is what the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH] and those of us who are interested in trying to see that American agriculture survives are trying to do here today by setting those priorities.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the farmer, and let us pass this bill and let them try to be successful for the crop year 1986.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to my good friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for taking the floor again, but things have been said here. Again, going back to the statement of administration policy, and I did not get this; I checked my office before I came over here, but I had to come over to the floor and see what somebody else received from OMB.

If it is true that this is new authority, what happened to that money we appropriated in December? Has anyone seen a rescission? Has anyone seen a deferral? It is still legally available.

This came up because the Department attorneys for the Department of Agriculture interpreted—their interpretation that this Congress, after it passed one bill, superseded that authority and appropriation by an authorization bill the following day, on December 20.

Well, where is it if it is being appropriated again, where was the rescission? Can anybody bring forth the rescission? Or the deferral? Or the difference between $4.4 billion and $2.7, which is about—where is the deferral? I do not think it can be found.

If they scored it, and they did score it against us in December, for the $4.4

billion; $4.4 was scored in December, where is it now? Of course it is still available, and we do not reappropriate; we only say it shall continue to be available. It is only language in there; it does not reappropriate. You do not change the outcome. You might if this does not provide it. You might have to come back again in June or whatever it is. We are already borrowing—the Secretary this morning told us we are borrowing from the third and fourth quarter of 1986 to fund the planting of crops. Not buying new farms or new equipment; only operating to plant the crop. We are borrowing from the third and fourth quarter.

□ 1235

We are borrowing for the third and fourth quarters. There are going to be requirements for the third and fourth quarters to carry out the act of 1985. Where is that money going to come from if we do not do this today? If you do not do it, you are going to be back here with a supplemental. Let us do it the right way. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania so often says, "Let's do what is right." Tell us right now what you need. Well, this is what agriculture is going to need. So vote for it.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I have no more requests for time. I would just like to close by commending our chairman for the great job he has done and by pointing out again that agriculture is in a desperate situation and urging support for this House Joint Resolution 534.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present, and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 272, nays 141, not voting 21, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mrs. Collins for, with Mr. Gibbons against.

Mr. RINALDO changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Messrs. STOKES, NIELSON of Utah, and ROEMER changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the motion was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BUDGET FOR THE U.S. GOVERNMENT, FISCAL YEARS 1987, 1988, AND 1989

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 397 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 397

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 296) setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989, and the first reading of the resolution shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed four hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Budget, the resolution shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. No amendment to the resolution shall be in order. At the conclusion of the consideration of the resolution in the Committee of the Whole, the Committee shall rise and report the resolution to the House, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution to final adoption without intervening motion except one motion to commit, which may not contain instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 397 provides for consideration of the President's budget. House Resolution 397 is a closed rule. It provides 4 hours of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Budget. The rule also provides one motion to commit which may not contain instructions.

Mr. Speaker, the Rules Committee grants closed rules infrequently and with some reservation. In this case, however, the rationale is clear. The rule provides an opportunity to vote directly on the President's budget. This is not the time for amendments. There will be time to debate substitutes when the Budget Committee reports a budget resolution.

The Rules Committee has provided a simple motion to commit without instructions since this resolution has not been reported from the Budget Committee. While the Budget Act provides that a motion to recommit a privileged budget resolution reported from the Budget Committee, or any substitutes that the House may adopt, is not in order, the Rules Committee believes that in this instance, because this resolution has not been reported, it would be appropriate to provide a motion to commit the resolution to the Budget Committee. The Rules Committee did not, however, believe a motion to commit with instructions was necessary. There are a number of avenues both the majority and minority are exploring as they try to develop a congressional budget. The time to discuss alternatives to the President's budget is when a reported resolution and any other major alternatives are considered by the House.

If it is the will of the House to reject the President's budget today, a congressional budget resolution will be considered in the near future. Chairman GRAY has said the Budget Committee will report a budget resolution by early April. I should add, as a member of the Budget Committee, we have been hard at work. The Budget Committee has held numerous hearings. We have consulted with the other House committees, as required by Gramm-Rudman. Democratic members of the committee have met regularly trying to develop a consensus position. We are close. Republican members of the committee have been meeting for the same purpose under the able leadership of the gentlelady from Illinois. As my colleagues know, Representative MARTIN stepped in when the gentleman from Ohio, the ranking minority member, fell ill. Mrs. MARTIN has done a fine job but I am pleased, as I am sure we all are, to see that my dear friend from Ohio, my colleague on both the Budget Committee and the Rules Committee, Representative LATTA is back with us.

Some Members have complained that the resolution before us was not reported from committee. That is not so unusual. Last week, the farm bills we considered were not reported from committee.

Mr. Speaker, it has been asked: Why are we considering the President's budget now? Why not wait until the Budget Committee reports its resolution? There are two reasons. First, the Budget Committee is seeking guidance. There are difficult choices to be made. During consideration of the President's budget, the will of the House can be expressed. The debate will inform and enlighten the Budget Committee.

The other reason to take up the President's budget now is the President has requested that we promptly do so. Administration witnesses appearing before the Appropriations Committee, the Budget Committee, and other House committees have asked that we give prompt and favorable consideration to the President's budget. The President himself, in his radio broadcasts, television appearances, and press interviews, has repeatedly made the same request.

The rule before the House simply gives us an up or down vote on the matter.

Mr. Speaker, if this rule is adopted, there will be ample opportunity to discuss the merits of the President's budget. I will not take time to discuss such matters now. I will address two substantive questions: Does the deficit in House Concurrent Resolution 296 represent the President's budget and is it within the limits set by the Budget Act and the rules of the House regarding maximum deficit amounts?

Mr. Speaker, there is some confusion about the President's deficit figure for fiscal year 1987. Some Members say the President's deficit is about $16 billion above the Gramm-Rudman target for fiscal year 1986. That is misleading. The President estimates his own deficit will be $143.6 billion, or $400 million below the maximum deficit mark.

It is true that the Congressional Budget Office estimated the President's deficit will be $16.7 billion higher than the President estimated. About $14 billion of that difference is in defense outlays. The administration and the Congressional Budget Office agree on defense budget authority but CBO uses historical spending patterns to estimate the defense spend-out rate. To determine how quickly the Defense Department will turn its budget authority into outlays, CBO looks at how quickly defense budget authority has been spent in the past. The administration believes, however, that historical defense spending patterns will not apply during the next fiscal years. There are a few other disagreements. CBO contends that the President underestimated outlays for farm price supports and overstated proceeds from the sale of Government assets.

I respectfully remind my colleagues we are talking about the President's budget. We will be voting on the President's proposals. When we debate congressional budget resolutions, CBO cost estimates are appropriate. It would have been unfair and misleading, however, to have called House Concurrent Resolution 296 the President's budget had we reestimated his deficit using CBO's assumptions. The President's deficit—using his own technical estimates and economic assumptions—is $143.6 billion.

There is another source of the $16 billion confusion. House Concurrent Resolution 296 shows two deficit figures. Section 4(a) says the President's deficit will be $159.3 billion but section 4(b) says the President's deficit will be $143.6 billion. The $159.3 billion figure does not include Social Security. I remind my colleagues that Gramm-Rudman—section 261(a)(1)—took Social Security off budget beginning in fiscal year 1986. The Social Security Trust Fund is estimated to run about $16.2 billion in the black for fiscal year 1987. The President's budget deficit, not counting that surplus, is $159.3 billion. This figure, however, cannot be compared with the Gramm-Rudman target of $144 billion.

Gramm-Rudman, in section 201(a)(1), specifies how the deficit is to be calculated for purposes of comparison with the maximum deficit amount. Social Security must be counted under the special rules. The President's budget deficit, therefore, for purposes of comparison with the maximum deficit amount, is $143.6 billion.

Mr. Speaker, the rule before the House simply provides an opportunity to consider the President's proposals. If his proposals are rejected, we will move forward knowing what changes must be made. The chairman of the Budget Committee has pledged himself to bring a budget resolution to the floor as soon as possible. Debate on the President's budget now can only aid the committee's markup in the near future.

Nonetheless, we will hear many excuses to put off this debate. We will hear charges of partisan politics. We will hear claims that the President's budget was dead on arrival, that no purpose can be served by putting another nail in the coffin. We will be told that the President's January proposals are outdated, that oil prices and interest rates have dropped. We may hear that even the President no longer stands behind his budget. That is not true. The President has, again and again, called for prompt and favorable consideration for his budget. He has never repudiated his budget. Do not listen to the excuses.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, there is only one reason some Members oppose this rule. They fear an up-or-down vote on the President's proposals. It is time to take a stand. It is time for the House to debate the President's budget. Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the previous question and adoption of the rule.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of New York. I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the distinguished Republican whip that, as he knows, we all from time to time make plans for being back in the district or whether or not we are going to be here and, from time to time, we have to cancel those engagements back in the district, however important they may be. I do have some very important engagements tomorrow. Looking down through the agenda, generally a person would be inclined to cancel those engagements. But as I find out, for the first time in history here we are going to vote on a President's budget as sent down, without the opportunity to amend it or give that type of consideration that makes any type of sense.

I regret to inform the Republican whip and my colleagues that, while I enjoy politics as much as anybody else, I cannot play today, and I am going to opt to go back to my district where I think the time can be much better spent.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 397 is a 4-hour, very closed rule providing for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 296, which purports in its title to be the "Congressional Budget for the United States Government." I repeat: The title is "The Congressional Budget for the United States Government."

Mr. Speaker, if this were the private sector, the authors of that title would be hauled into court for violating the "Truth in Labeling Act," because there ain't no way in God's green earth that this can be called a "Congressional budget." I presume, under the terms of the Budget Act. It was not considered, discussed, amended or reported by the House Budget Committee.

Now, the gentleman from Texas just said, "Well, that's no big deal. Other committees don't act on legislation that comes to the floor."

And I just have to ask my colleagues: On something as important as the budget resolution, the budget for the Government for the fiscal year, you do not want the committee to consider it and act? Why have the committee? Are we going to start over and over again allowing bills to come from whatever committee, Appropriations or Budget or Agriculture, without going to committee? We will just all meet in the Committee of the Whole. That is the most powerful committee. But I think it is totally ludicrous to say that it is no big problem if it does not go through the committee process. I think it is very important.

This was just simply introduced by the Budget chairman last Monday and brought directly to the Rules Committee yesterday.

Make no mistake about it: This is not the Congressional budget process we are following. It is a partisan fudge-it process designed to score some political points and obscure the lack of a Democrat alternative or even the fact that nothing is happening in the Budget Committee.

But I do not think that the American people are going to be taken in for one minute by this flim-flam sham. The perpetrators of this little exercise today should heed the wisdom of what should be an ancient Chinese proverb, even if it is not, which goes like this: "He who throws eggs into the wind ends up with egg on face."

I would advise my colleagues who are involved in this little exercise today to refrain from throwing your rotten eggs in this direction. The yolk may be on you.

Now, Mr. Speaker, House Concurrent Resolution 296 indicates on its cover that it was introduced by request. When questioned in the Rules Committee by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. QUILLEN], the ranking minority member, as to who requested its introduction, Chairman GRAY responded that the President had asked for its consideration. As proof—proof, ladies and gentleman—of that request, he cited a line in the President's budget message that reads, "Let's do it," and a T-shirt that the President once held up to the TV cameras which read, "Save our budget."

Mr. Speaker, this is the first time, to my knowledge, that a committee chairman has felt compelled to follow the dictates of a T-shirt. One can just imagine the successes this administration might have if it floods the Hill with T-shirts and bumper stickers.

But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, when the Budget chairman was asked again who requested the introduction of this resolution, two Rules Committee members on the other side of the aisle, the Democrats, admitted that they had requested that we follow this procedure. Their candor is refreshing, even if their tactics are a little stale. But even more refreshing was the candor of another Rules Committee member, a Democrat, the gentleman from California [Mr. BEILENSON], who questioned the wisdom of this whole approach, even though he opposed the President's budget request. He suggested that the President's budget should be considered in connection with the Budget Committee's budget and other alternatives which will be coming to the floor later on.

Now, the point was also made by the gentleman from Texas that there is no need for amendments at this point. I do not recall since the budget process got started that we have ever had a situation where a budget was brought up with no amendments in order, no substitutes, no alternatives. This is a little different. Even an opportunity to have any kind of motion to recommit with instructions was knocked out, no Democrat alternative, no Republican alternative.

And I might point out to my colleagues that some gentlemen did come to the Rules Committee, one from Illinois, one from Minnesota and one from Colorado, who have a budget process ready to go, serious, they put a lot of work into it, they worked with CBO, it cuts spending, it cuts back on defense, it raises revenue. But they said, "This is such a sideshow that we are not getting on this train."

So it could be done. We could have amendments in order and we could be doing this seriously, but, unfortunately, we are not doing it at this point.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LOTT. I would like to finish my remarks, like the gentleman from Texas did, and I will be glad to yield at that point. I am sure we can engage in polemics here, a little fun. That is what this is all about. It will be great, because I know the gentleman from Massachusetts always has a sense of humor, and we appreciate that. And that is the way we should handle this. I mean this is fun and games. We are going to have a little fun here this afternoon, and let's don't get mad, let's don't get serious, we can talk seriously later, I hope. And I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, is going to be serious about trying to develop a budget and, hopefully, a bipartisan budget. But this ain't it. This is a waste of time.

Now, if any of you think that this is all right, I want to point out to you that this is the middle of March, and we have not done anything. The clock marches on, and we are still sucking our thumbs. Even our colleagues on the other side of the Capitol, Democrat and Republican, are working together and making progress on developing a budget. But are we doing that? No. We are here on the floor, playing, while the clock marches on.

And you might think, "Well, we have got plenty of time."

Let me tell you, we are not going to make the April 1 deadline. We are not going to make the April 15. We are wasting time here today, we are wasting time on the budget process.

You might say, "Oh, we can do it before Easter."

Baloney. As a matter of fact, look at your Congressional calendars that are sent to you by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], and which I sent out on my side of the aisle. We need a break. We have worked so hard, we need a break. Let us take a recess for Easter. And why wait for Easter? Let's go out in March. Your calendar will show you that we are scheduled to go out at the close of business on Tuesday March 25. Now, how many of you wiseacres around here think that we are going to come in here and work on Monday and Tuesday when we are going to be out Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday?

So let us go ahead. Does the gentleman believe that? No, he does not believe that. Let us go ahead and admit it; we have got 1 week. Five days before we go out for the Easter recess. Next week and that is it. Then we will be back on Monday, April 7? Come on. You know we are not coming back in here Monday, April 7. We will have a couple of suspensions, maybe a little rule change here; nothing much. We will put the vote off until Tuesday.

We are not coming back here until April 8. Are we going to have a budget resolution by the first of May? God, I hope so. But why, why do we not go ahead and get the process going. Why are we doing this?

Look at your calendars and you are going to be very surprised and disappointed that we are not doing anything.

Even the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, met with our colleagues on the other side of the aisle in a bipartisan way so we could get together and agree on some basics like baselines. Let us get together and understand what we are talking about. Let us not have apples and oranges. Let us not have Democrat numbers in the House; Republican numbers in the House. CBO numbers, OMB numbers; let us cut all that out. Let us agree on a set of numbers.

I thought that was a good idea. I did not think that was partisan. But somehow the meetings never happened. We do not even know what numbers we are talking about. We cannot even agree on the starting point.

I am frustrated by this; I am disappointed that we are going through this exercise. The Republican leadership, the distinguished lady from Illinois, who is our acting ranking Member on the Budget Committee, has been doing an outstanding job. We want to work with you; we made that offer. I am telling you, we are ready to go. We know where we need to go and we will talk with you about it; we will exchange some ideas.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROEMER. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, my respect for the gentleman is high. He has earned his pay today in a most difficult role. Let me make sure I understand your role.

Are you telling your friends and colleagues in the House that you do not want a vote on the President's budget? That it does not deserve a vote? That it is dead already so why kill it again?

Just exactly what are you saying?

Mr. LOTT. What I want a vote on is a serious budget resolution where the Congress, the House of Representatives, lives up to the Budget Act law and to the Constitution. Never but one other time has the Congress, the House of Representatives brought a President's budget directly to the floor of the House, and that was done one other time with the Reagan budget, never, in 4 years, did the House bring up a Carter budget resolution.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROEMER. Now, I have the highest regard for the gentleman and I do not want to misspeak. He has characterized the President's budget as a rotten egg; he has characterized it as frivolous, nonserious——

Mr. LOTT. No, no, no, no, no. I take back my time.

I did not say that. What I characterized as a rotten egg was this process; the way this is being handled. The waste of time we are dealing with here.

Mr. ROEMER. You said it was nonserious. The President's budget is not serious?

Mr. LOTT. No; the process and the way that this is being brought up with no alternatives; no opportunities for amendments. Everybody in this room knows that this is going to be voted against en bloc by the Democrats.

Mr. ROEMER. As a friend of the gentleman I just wanted to make it clear: You are not opposed to the President's budget; you like it You are opposed to the process.

Mr. LOTT. As a matter of fact, I like the President's budget.

Mr. ROEMER. Thank you. We will talk more about that today.

Mr. LOTT. I want to make that perfectly clear. In my district, they think this budget has got a lot of positive features. But we are going to make some changes in the President's recommendations, as we have always done. That is our prerogative under the Budget Act and the Constitution.

We are not doing that here; you will not even give us an opportunity to have an alternative for anybody or any amendments. But I appreciate the gentleman's participation.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, my friend from Louisiana has anticipated some of what I had to say. I just wanted to underline what the strategy is on the other side today, and that is, at all costs to stay away from the merits of the President's budget.

We are going to debate everything, apparently, but the budget itself. The gentleman is going to be critical of the fact that we are voting on it. We are going to be talking about the procedures. Let me say that if this budget is voted down, of course there will be an alternative opportunity.

Mr. LOTT. When? When would we have that opportunity? Would we have that opportunity before the first of April? Would we have that opportunity that would meet the deadline that we voted for in Gramm-Rudman?

Mr. FRANK. Are these rhetorical questions or will the gentleman again yield to me to answer them?

Mr. LOTT. I would like to speak for awhile and I will yield back to you.

We would like to also debate your Democrat alternative. Put it out, and then we will go forward with the two of them side-by-side.

I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman for yielding again, and maybe I will get 40 seconds in this time.

The point is that we will have a chance to do that if the President's budget is voted down. The President has said that this is what he wants. I was at a hearing, the gentleman said: "Who asked us to vote on the President's budget?"

I was at a hearing this morning, in the Immigration Subcommittee, and the Director of Immigration was there. I asked him, "What would happen if we had sequestration and other alternatives?" He said, "Give us the President's budget and we will be OK." So I had that today from the Commissioner of Immigration.

I do not understand why it should be considered illegitimate to say that it is a two-step process.

We will first have an up-or-down vote on the President's——

Mr. LOTT. Did you say legitimate or illegitimate?

Mr. FRANK. I do not understand why you consider it illegitimate. I would advise the gentleman that is the nicest form of that word I may use on the floor with the Parliamentarian looking on.

I do not understand why it is considered illegitimate to vote on the President's budget. If it is defeated, there will then be the chance to vote on the alternatives. We just pointed out, the gentleman has characterized the President's budget, if we got back before he revises his remarks, "As a waste of time, a rotten egg, and is not serious." He said, "We do not want to vote on this; we want to vote on a serious budget."

Well, if we get this out of the way, we can get on to the serious budgets.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I think before I speak you should again correct the "rotten egg" reference by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LOTT. I do not need to correct it because the way I stated it clearly was directed to the process.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. It was very clear to me.

In other words, what you are saying is that the 5 hours or more that we will spend on this process today could be better spent in really doing what we are all here to do.

I see the majority leader, JIM WRIGHT here on the floor, and he recently stated regarding the budget, "Congress makes the budget. The President does not."

That is a very important distinction. I think, as the gentleman in the well has pointed out, over the history of this country, and I would suspect the history of every State in this country and every local municipality and county, probably never has there been an instance where a budget submitted by the Chief Executive of that particular jurisdiction has ever gone through completely unchanged.

There have been some changes since the President submitted the budget; there are some things that need to be done. Why do we not have the alternative from the Democrats? Obviously, they do not agree with the President's budget; where is theirs?

I agree with the gentleman that we could spend the time much better today than we are going to.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to the rule for consideration of the President's 1987 Federal budget proposal. This is nothing but a sham and act of political posturing. No bipartisan committee hearings have been held so far and the Democrat majority does not even have an alternative. This Nation, and particularly the Congress, is facing a difficult task in abiding by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit requirements but my liberal colleagues on the other side of the aisle feel compelled to play games and try to embarrass the President even though the majority of the Nation, in poll after poll, believe that the fault lies with the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, Democractic majority leader JIM WRIGHT of Texas recently stated regarding the budget "Congress makes the budget; the President does not. That is a very important distinction." He is certainly correct. I would like to point out to the American people that the power of the purse lies with the Congress and that the house has been dominated by democrats for approximately 30 years. Many of my liberal colleagues on the other side of the aisle have simply not acted to reduce the deficit. They have opposed the balanced budget amendment, the line-item veto, cost cutting recommendations of the Grace Commission and various amendments to appropriation bills to cut spending and reduce waste.

Finally, to prove who is truly responsible for increasing the debt and causing these deficits, a watchdogs of the Treasury study for the first session of the 99th Congress showed of that of the 136 Representatives who were honored for showing fiscal responsibility, 126 were Republicans and only 10 were Democrats. Who is kidding whom?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I just wanted to make sure I understand the gentleman's point.
